Without even a passing glance at Oliver as he shouted and distanced himself, Elsa faced off against Ornea, a distance greater than ten meters between them.

Ten meters. —Such may have been the separation, but for Elsa and Ornea, it was tantamount to there being no distance between them at all. Not to mention, the range of Ornea's kusari-fundo would easily hit its mark at even double that distance.

Elsa: "At any rate, have you changed your ideologies, I wonder? Before, you'd hated to get the surroundings involved, so to think you'd take out an entire dragon carriage in order to kill us…"

Ornea: "…"

Elsa: "Moreover, I think you also used to be more talkative."

With a sidelong glance to the flattened dragon carriage, Elsa tilted her head.

However, Ornea gave no reply. —Nay, a reply there had been. Not one of words, but through an instantaneous impact delivered by the kusari-fundo.

Elsa: "—Hk."

Promptly reeling her head back, she narrowly evaded the unleashed weight as it grazed past her cheek. Enough might dwelled in the unleashed weight to crush a human skull as if it were a fruit.

That was not difficult to infer from how it made the snow-covered road seem to explode behind her.

Thus, with that attack as the impetus, Elsa and Ornea began their fight to the death.

Elsa: “Sh—”

With a low posture, Elsa dashed across the snow at the speed of an arrow.

Erasing the distance of ten meters in the literal blink of an eye, she brandished her blade. The curved blade, wielded in a reverse grip, was the armament she had prepared for confrontation against Ornea.

As a result of seeking the weapon that suited her best whilst being half-killed by Ornea many a time in the basement underneath the Featherrun Mansion, this was the territory at which she had arrived.

Elsa: “With this, I’m going to gouge out your heart.”

Ornea: “…”

Elsa: “How cold.”

With a silver flash of light, the blade surged towards Ornea’s thin chest, just as promised. But, Ornea safeguarded against the attack by forcing her arm into the path of the blade, causing her left arm to be blown off from the elbow down.

However, scattering blood as it flew, the pain or sense of loss incurred by that severed arm would not serve as cause to stop Ornea. —Congenital analgesia, that was undoubtedly the characteristic that made Ornea the strongest.

Born with an inability to feel pain, Ornea was unconcerned with the destruction of her own body. Hence, she could carry out acts of savagery as calmly as if she were playing with dolls.

Reversing the direction of the blade that sliced off the arm, another blow aimed for Ornea’s neck. With her unbelievably flexible body, Ornea bent backwards to evade it. —No, she had not evaded it with her flexible body. Ornea had deliberately broken her own ankles and knees, forcibly lowering her body to escape the range of the blade.

Then, the shattered bores in her ankles reconnected in an instant, and she took up the offensive. A fist rocketed upwards with the force of her rising body, crashing directly into Elsa's upraised knee.

Elsa: "—Hk."

The report of an impact splitting the air, Elsa's knee and Ornea's arm simultaneously shattered.

Crushed were the bodies of the assailant and assailed akin; the extraordinary destructive explosion was made manifest only due to the fact that neither party cared for the destruction of their own bodies.

'Twas a madness born of transcending mortal bounds, made possible by a lack of concern for their own survival.

An unorthodox fight to the death it was, one that disregarded a core tenet of all living beings, that of protecting one's own life.

Elsa: "Fufu, aha, AHAHAHAHA—!!!"

As they clashed with murderous intent that scattered blood, shattered bone, and splattered flesh, Elsa's lips loosened, a roar of laughter resounding upon the snowy road.

With halting steps, swift conduct, and occasional flying about, the battle unfolded.

Even if they evaded each other, it was the utmost extremity of combat, with seldom a notion of defense in mind.

A fight to the death between those who could not die, in which certain death would be inescapable for anyone save the Featherrun Sisters, made possible expressly because they were Featherrun Sisters.

Their dismembered arms and legs, their crushed eyeballs and throats, their streaming blood, their lives, all would regenerate.

This fight to the death, a sacrilege of life, could not have taken place between anyone except Elsa and Ornea. That was precisely why, vigilant of Ornea’s power, Elsa had awaited the arrival of this day.

She had awaited this murderous game, where both parties would exert the utmost of their desperate efforts, and relish in the sensation of being brought to the brink of that distant demise.

Elsa: “Fu—!!”

Meeting the oncoming fist with her own, both of their arms were smashed up to their elbows. At a range so close that their shoulders crashed into each other, Elsa brandished her specialized weapon, piercing directly into Ornea’s throat. At the same time, Ornea wrapped her kusari-fundo around Elsa’s neck, giving rise to a firm report as it snapped backwards.

Both had suffered fatal wounds to the neck. With a momentary severance in consciousness, the one with the slower recovery would receive a serious blow.

A sound arose, and life poured in to mend her snapped neck, allowing blood to flow and restore her brain. However, that recovery had taken nearly a full second. In that time, Ornea would have been able to recover faster—

Ornea: “…”

But recover, she did not.

Neck perforated, Ornea sunk back as she spewed out blood, extracting the curved blade. Then, taking a step forward to catch up to her, this time Elsa slammed the extracted blade into her forehead.

Forehead smashed, the curved blade churned the brains located within. Her eyes losing their sense of focus, copious amounts of gore spurted out from Ornea’s nose and ears, and bearing witness, Elsa howled.

Elsa: “Ah, AHH, AHHHHHHHHH—!!!”

With her curved blade lodged inside her opponent’s cranium, Elsa ripped Ornea's body asunder with her bare hands. Mauling her neck, thrusting her fingers into the open wounds, she tore open Ornea's body with every ounce of strength she could muster.

Just as a fish would be flayed, Ornea's blood and viscera spilled out as she fell apart. Unwilling to permit that destruction, Ornea shot her shattered knees upwards, driving them into her opponent's face. Her thus upraised legs were grabbed, and her body was brutally slammed down into the snow.

Then, straddling the face-up Ornea, Elsa snatched up the kusari-fundo, and slammed the weight down over, and over, and over and over and over and over again, pulverizing her cranium.

Smashing, smashing, smashing, pulverizing, pulverizing—

Oliver: "—ELSA! ELSA! THAT'S ENOUGH! YE'VE DONE ENOUGH!!"

As Elsa swung downwards with an unceasing destructive impulse, it was Oliver who grappled her from behind, desperate to stop her.

When she slowly shifted her gaze, into her vision came Oliver, his face wrought with resolve. Splotches of blood were speckled over his body, and his clothes were disheveled as if he had been sent flying.

—No, it was not as if he had been sent flying. He had been sent flying.

In his attempt to stop Elsa as she lost control of herself in her unending beatdown of Ornea, time after time had Oliver tried to grab Elsa, and each time he had continued to be hurled away, tumbling over.

Repeating that over and over, he had finally brought Elsa back to her senses, putting an end to the violence.

Elsa: "Hah, hah, haah…"

Her breathing heavy, Elsa looked down at the one she had been straddling, Ornea— or at least that which had once been Ornea.

With her skull having been relentlessly bashed in, the girl had been crushed like a fruit.

That figure, with nary a twitch, had completely forfeited any and all ability to do battle.

Oliver: “Elsa… have ye settled down?”

Clinging to her arms, perhaps due to having been flung away several times, Oliver’s bandages had come undone. On that hand of his, three fingers were missing. —His fingers had not all been able to be attached. It was uncertain whether the remaining fingers would ever be able to move again.

Though, even if he lacked fingers, it would not be all too troubling as a slaver—

Elsa: “…It’s not the time to be thinking such things.”

Smiling at her own useless thoughts, Elsa once again took in the sight of Ornea’s unmoving remains.

Without speaking even a single word, Ornea had been pulverized by Elsa. Contrary to her sweet nature, she who had been unbelievably strong, had become utterly unrecognizable.

Why, why had Elsa won? —That was incorrect. Elsa had not defeated Ornea.

This was something else entirely, something that was not Ornea. Ornea had already been dead by the time she ambushed Elsa. Hence, this was an empty husk, one that could have never possibly hoped to be Ornea.

—In the end, the only two who remained were Elsa and Sithonia.

Chapter 6:
Sithonia Featherrun

1

—To locate the patch of Hallowed Land known as the Featherrun Estate had required quite a bit of effort.

Even within the Gustekan Church, they were a secret unit, one whose acts of service would never be revealed to the public. That was the position the Featherrun Sisters had been placed in, and had been their duty for many years.

To find those who knew of their existence, and those who possessed any further details, had been no easy task. Systematically, they followed the sequential order with sights set on their destination.

That had been a difficult journey given Elsa's lazy personality, but not once had she thought to give up along the way. To that extent, it was an issue difficult to abandon for Elsa.

For that purpose, she had snuck into the domiciles of those who seemed well informed regarding the Gustekan Church, forced them to speak about what they knew, silenced them, and brought about circumstances such that many important individuals in the Church of the Holy King to be replaced; accreting all those deeds, she finally found it.

Thus, Elsa had succeeded in returning home after several long months.

Elsa: "…"

Returning home for the first time in what felt like ages, the mansion was in a wretched state.

The garden to which Dorothea had tended had ceased to be maintained after she disappeared, the beautiful flowers having been taken over and ousted by weeds.

Saria and Hildea's dog kennel had fallen silent, and the surrounding area had become dominated by a cold, dry stillness, with nary a merry tone in sight.

The dining hall frequented by the gluttonous Ornea had also become quite desolate, and because everyone who would sit around the dining table had disappeared, the water in the flower vases had not been changed either.

Elsa: "If she's stopped keeping up any and all appearances…"

This had once been an ephemeral flower garden of dreams constructed by slave girls. Having woken up from those dreams, it was no longer possible for anyone to remain here.

Nobody could remain here, so nobody could put an end to the devastation of that flower garden.

Feeling loneliness in that, Elsa's legs, as if being guided forth, proceed deeper into the mansion— ironically, she descended the steps that led to the underground, a place that had left the greatest impression on Elsa.

She had only lived in this mansion for half a year, but just how many times had she descended these steps? And, in that cold, dark place, just how many fatal wounds had she suffered?

—By approaching death, she grasped the satisfaction of life that she had nearly given up.

That had been a ridiculously ironic enticement, but it had been necessary for Elsa.

Thus, as she set foot into the nostalgic basement—

???: "…So, not even Ornea was able to stop you."

Indeed, alongside a quiet voice, Sithonia appeared clad in a dress of red.

Ever unchanged was her posture, overlapping with the one present in Elsa's memories. —A malevolent weapon akin to Dorothea, traps akin to Saria and Hildea, a revenant stance akin to Ornea, without conforming to any of those traits, it was a figure truly befitting Sithonia.

Elsa: "Though, I'd surely thought you would have made many more preparations to welcome me."

Sithonia: "Indeed, I had considered it. But, given that you were able to eliminate Ornea, any trap I set would be futile, correct? Even I am capable of understanding that…"

Elsa: "—Please, don't refer to that as Ornea."

Sithonia: "…"

Sithonia's gentle manner of speaking found itself interrupted by an icy remark from Elsa's lips. Coming from Elsa, that was a rare vocalization of emotion.

Perhaps finding Elsa's words surprising, Sithonia slightly raised her eyebrows,

Sithonia: "I am surprised. So even you were in possession of sisterly emotions.”

Elsa: “Sisterly emotions, sympathy for Ornea, I have both… What did you do to Ornea? How in the world did you break her mind, I wonder?”

Receiving Elsa’s query, Sithonia cast her eyes down in sorrow.

Ornea’s mind had been shattered. —That was the conclusion Elsa had drawn after engaging in mortal combat against Ornea, achieving a crushing victory. That had been the root of her victory, which had allowed her to defeat the weakened Ornea upon that snowfield.

If she were to have done battle against the real Ornea in earnest, the probability for Elsa to be still standing here would either have been fifty-fifty, or likely even less than that.

Elsa: “But, I would never let myself be defeated by Ornea in such a state. And so, here I am.”

Sithonia: “Then, by killing me, you intend to achieve completion as a Curse Doll, yes?”

Elsa: “…What?”

Her words of mourning were halted by Sithonia’s unthinkable statement.

The completion of the Curse Dolls; as Elsa narrowed her eyes at that utterance, Sithonia smiled. That had been a terribly parched smile, one very much unlike Sithonia.

Sithonia: “Do not deceive me. I am aware. I know, Elsa. Of what Father set into motion, on that night. Of the death battle between sisters, the rite of Curse Doll completion.”

Elsa: “…”

Sithonia: “For the purpose of acquiring this Curse Doll art, I arrived here at Featherrun… however, if it never started, that would have been fine. After all, the days I spent here were of great comfort!”

Clutching at her chest tightly, with a grievous smile strewn upon her face, Sithonia complained to Elsa.

Coming and going through Elsa's mind were the days she had spent with her sisters at this mansion. Amidst those days, it was no lie that Sithonia, whilst thinking of and ordering around the sisters, felt fulfilled.

It could not have been a lie. Even so, she still—

Elsa: "—You desired the completion of the ritual. That's why you sent Dorothea, then Saria and Hildea, over to me in order. Shattering Ornea's mind, it was for the same reason, wasn't it?"

Sithonia: "…"

Elsa: "A completed Curse Doll… is that really such an enticing idea to you?"

Sithonia: "You…!"

Tilting her head, Elsa voiced a question with a scant few emotions, causing Sithonia to bite her lip. Violent emotions emerged on her face, laying bare the negative thoughts that had amassed within Sithonia.

And, Elsa's keen sense of smell was already alert as to what that was.

People would emit all sorts of scents just by living their lives. For Elsa, routinely picking up on them as she lived day to day, was an act as natural as breathing.

—The emotion oozing out of Sithonia, the truth of it was "terror".

An unbearable, expansive terror was enveloping Sithonia, urging her to commit atrocities.

Elsa: "Just what in the world are you so afraid of?"

Sithonia: "…The most dreadful, most repulsive being in this world."

Elsa: “Dreadful, and repulsive…”

Sithonia’s voice, trembling with fear, prompted Elsa to imagine the object of that fear. However, Elsa had a weak imagination, so there was no concreteness provided to that which Sithonia feared.

The dreadful, repulsive being that frightened Sithonia, it was—

Sithonia: “—Mother.”

Elsa: “Mother…”

Sithonia: “To be precise, the monster that calls itself my mother. In order to escape that monster’s dominion, I require that secret art…!”

Asserting so, Sithonia’s eyes bore an impulsive light residing within. That instant, as if hailed by Sithonia’s emotions, shadows swooped down upon Elsa as she stood stock still.

Promptly reacting, Elsa swung the curved blade that she had drawn from the hem of her dress. And not missing her mark, Elsa slit open the torso of the one who had leaped at her.

But, before Elsa’s eyes, after inflicting the fatal slash, a variance was borne in that wound.

Elsa: “This is…”

In the blink of an eye, the wound on the figure closed up.

Then, grabbing Elsa’s arm in her moment of surprise, the figure slammed her body into the ground. She made somewhat of an attempt to shake it off, but to no avail. After all, the figure was not alone.

One, two— no, five, then six, one after another did the assassins emerge from the shadows. Each and every one of these figures possessed empty eyes, and were clad in dresses.

Elsa: “These girls are…”

Sithonia: “—Do you recall the night of the ritual?”

Looking down on Elsa, pinned to the ground, Sithonia embraced her own elbows as she posed a question. The “night of the ritual” in question was a night different to the one upon which Holosseo had perished.

—It was the night upon which Elsa, by way of a secret art, had attained the body of a Curse Doll. Recalling the details of the night of the ritual, Elsa realized the identities of the surrounding dress-clad assassins.

That day, Dorothea had spoken thus. —Many had perished in the ritual’s failure.

She had assuredly thought that they had all lost their lives, but that had not been the case. Because they had lacked the adaptability to become Curse Dolls, it was their ego that they forfeited—

Elsa: “Just like Ornea, they live only to follow orders…”

Sithonia: “That is my poison. My trump card. This underground, in truth, is not a place for us sisters to battle to the death. It was a place to discard those who failed to become sisters.”

As if to supplement Sithonia’s explanation, walking out of the dim lighting in droves were the ruined husks of what ought to have all been formerly beautiful maidens.

No matter how beautiful they may have been in life, their shattered and abandoned hearts rendered that beauty meaningless, completely reducing them to mere repulsive dolls.

Beholding them, Elsa thought aloud with an “Ah”.

Elsa: “These girls fit the term “Curse Dolls” much more than we do.”

Sithonia: “Yes, yes, exactly, Elsa! It is just as you say… these are Curse Dolls. Exceedingly unsightly and wicked… however, that is why I require their power.”

Elsa: “…So that you can obtain a body that doesn’t die, and escape from your mother’s dominion?”

Sithonia: “Yes, exactly!”

With an ardent expression, Sithonia affirmed Elsa’s words. Firmly tapping her heel on the ground, the eldest daughter unveiled her objective, and upon hearing it, Elsa took a long, deep breath.

In order to escape her mother’s dominion, she was attempting to complete the ritual imposed by her father.

Even just looking at it literally, it was far too comical.

Elsa: “Sithonia… you’re an extremely pitiful girl, wouldn’t you say?”

Sithonia: “Elsa?”

Elsa: “Wanting to get away from your mother, you imitate your father’s way of doing things… although, if you were so troubled, you ought to have just talked to someone. If you had done that…”

Sithonia: “—BUT! YOU WERE THE ONE WHO STARTED IT!”

Sithonia rejected Elsa’s pity head-on. Her basis: the night upon which Holosseo was killed— she tried to frame Elsa’s act of killing him as the genesis.

Sithonia: “By killing Father, you set the rite into motion. You started the rite to bring the Curse Dolls to completion… so then, the only choice I have left is to come out on top.”

Elsa: “…”

Sithonia: “Emerging victorious, and becoming a completed Curse Doll. If I do that, I can escape her dominion.”

Repeating herself, Sithonia spoke of her own desire.

Just how much fear had needed to be tasted, how much despair had needed to be known in order to engrave Sithonia’s soul with such wounds, Elsa knew not.

She knew not, however—

Elsa: "—Even if we talk, I suppose it will no longer be of any use."

Sensing the breakdown of her conversation with Sithonia, Elsa silently muttered.

As Sithonia grasped Elsa's intent, she immediately thrust her palm forth, and commanded Elsa "Do not move" in a firm tone of voice.

Sithonia: "It is truly unfortunate… But, I am going to kill you, Elsa."

Elsa: "…I may be the one saying this, but I don't think you'll be able to kill me so easily. Even when reduced to just a head, I was able to recover from that."

Sithonia: "Indeed. I doubted my ears when I first heard it. Compared to you, my affinity with Curse Arts is no match. However, you can be killed. Just as you did to Ornea."

As she spoke, Sithonia's gaze shifted towards the Curse Dolls— to the failed sisters, who were pinning down Elsa.

Sensing the intent in that gaze, the Curse Dolls slowly readied their weapons. Each of them was equipped with fiendish armaments, those that had been stored in this basement for use by the sisters.

Not a single one was left unarmed, all so that the Curse Dolls could definitively kill Elsa.

Sithonia: "I wish to inflict as little torment as possible. But, in your case…"

Elsa: "Unlike Ornea, who can't feel these things, that which is painful does hurt me. Ah, but, you don't have to worry, I'll be fine. After all, I don't particularly dislike pain."

Sithonia: "—. Even if that is true for you…"

It is not the same for me, with human conceptions much unlike the Featherrun Sisters, Sithonia endeavored to at least give Elsa a peaceful sendoff.

Gently reaching her hand out, Sithonia laid her fingers upon Elsa's forehead, and,

Sithonia: "Now, sleep. My youngest sister."

Elsa: "…"

Indeed, with a voice as if a prayer, Sithonia exhaled a deep breath.

Then, as if having received some sort of forgiveness, the wrinkles on her brow relaxed oh so slightly,

Sithonia: "With this…"

Elsa: "—? So then, what changed?"

Sithonia: "Eh?"

The next instant, Elsa stirred before a dumbfounded Sithonia.

To escape the Curse Dolls that were restraining her, Elsa dislocated her own shoulders, and forcibly shook off their arms.

It was an imitation of Ornea. However, for her, it would have been an act bereft of pain to be carried out calmly, but for Elsa, pain was indeed present. A fierce, violent pain that pierced her brain.

However—

Elsa: "What a thrill."

Converting that pain into pleasure, Elsa relocated her dislocated arms, grabbed the head of a Curse Doll that had had its stance broken, and slammed it into the ground through sheer force.

Crashing into the hard rock floor of the basement, the Curse Doll's head split open, its contents spilling out. Thereupon, Elsa did not hesitate to drop to her knees, and thoroughly smash apart the cranium along with its contents until the thread of life was severed.

With this, the remaining Curse Dolls numbered nine—.

Elsa: “It feels like the Featherrun Sisters have gotten a bit cheaper.”

Sithonia: “Wha, aa—!”

Before Sithonia as she watched over that slaughter in astonishment, Elsa drew out two curved blades. Readying the black, sinister knives in both her hands, she commenced her onslaught upon the Curse Dolls.

The rest of the unintentioned Curse Dolls were spurred to counterattack right after the second Curse Doll was decapitated, its remaining body sliced apart from chest to abdomen.

Curse Dolls: “…”

Ferociously, the Curse Dolls charged in with nary a sound or word. And, the one commanding that attack was Sithonia, having fallen back to distance herself from the battlefield, astonished as she was.

Through some technique, Sithonia held command over the Curse Dolls’ wills, forcing them to obey her orders in a vein akin to Ornea, whose mind had been shattered.

The skill of bending them into submission, it was truly a sight to behold. Elsa, too, was overcome with admiration.

Elsa: “You are far more suited to puppeteering dolls than that Father ever was.”

Sithonia: “ELSA—!!!”

Elsa: “You know, even if you weren’t speaking in such a loud voice, I would still be able to hear you.”

Her praise blotted over by an angered bellow, Elsa dissolved into the shadows with a look of discontent. Traversing from shadow to shadow, Elsa disrupted the Curse Dolls that outnumbered her, and wielding her immortal body as a weapon, she crushed them one by one as they rushed down on her with reckless abandon.

Elsa: “No awakening like Dorothea.”

They were a far cry from Dorothea, who in the midst of battle, had acquired the art of manipulating blood, allowing her to drive Elsa into a corner.

Elsa: “No trump cards like Saria and Hildea.”

They were a far cry from Saria and Hildea, who had used every effort at their disposal for the sake of sisterly emotions that may not have appeared to be so.

Elsa: “Even if they’re in the same state as Ornea, Ornea alone was far stronger”

And, they were a far, far cry from Ornea, who was stronger than anyone among the sisters, even with her mind shattered.

That was why, Elsa’s malevolent blades tore through the entirety of a Curse Doll, inflicting fatal wounds, delivering more and more fatal wounds without allowing any room for regeneration, until all movement ceased.

Sithonia: “Stop this! Elsa!”

Ecstatic from the massacre, Elsa’s slashing attacks mercilessly severed both arms off a Curse Doll. Having lost its arms, the doll that appeared to have lost all means of attack attempted to bite out Elsa’s throat.

A kick to its torso forced it against the wall, and then another kick whipped around, demolishing its skull. The fundamentals of killing a Curse Doll were the cranium, then the heart; an irrevocable death would form the means to grant death.

Sithonia: “STOP! STOP…!!”

The downswing of a battleaxe was caught by the two daggers, forcibly diverting the impact to the side. Its posture wavered from the wholehearted blow, and thereupon did Elsa withdraw her daggers, maneuvering them into a slashing attack.

Closing her arms in from left and right, the blades carved a crucifix-shaped scar into the face of the Curse Doll. Even if there was no pain, the doll reeled from the impact, and tripping over itself, it toppled over backwards. The Curse Doll hit the back of its head on the ground, and crushing its neck with her heel, she executed it.

Sithonia: “STOOOOOOOOOOOOOP—!!!”

Without listening to that screaming voice, Elsa cleaved through the arms, torso, and legs of the Curse Doll leaping at her, and kicked the upper body that fell to the ground far away.

And then—

Elsa: “—Sithonia.”

Sithonia: “Eek.”

Looking back, Sithonia’s face froze over with fear the moment her name had been called.

Shaking her head in reluctance as Elsa stepped forward to approach her, Sithonia waved her arm, and in front of her appeared a Curse Doll to block the way.

But, bereft of will, and unable to cooperate, the Curse Doll would not serve as Elsa’s opponent.

The heart of the Curse Doll was gouged out by a blow from Elsa, its eyes rolling to the back of its head as it collapsed.

Elsa: “This is the end.”

Sithonia: “…”

Aghast, Sithonia looked up at Elsa, the massacre having concluded.

Indeed, before she knew it, Sithonia had fallen to her knees, sinking down to the ground.

Sithonia: “Ah, ah…”

Gaining cognizance to that disgraceful conduct of hers, Sithonia writhed in an effort to stand up. However, that combative spirit transferred not to her knees, her trembling body refusing to listen to her.

Sithonia possessed no combat ability. —The reason why Sithonia had been frequently called out on missions was not because of her combat ability, but rather, because her unusual ability proved a useful asset.

Elsa: “I get that you were mimicking your deceased father, and mobilizing the Featherrun Sisters, but… what’s this poison you were talking about?”

Sithonia: “Th-That’s…”

Unable to stand back up, Sithonia’s breath caught at the inquiry. But, reaching into her clothing, she showed Elsa what she had pulled out from there.

That, was a charm in a pouch of faint coloration.

Elsa: “That’s, the charm that you said you gifted to your sisters…”

Sithonia: “…The fragrant stone within, laces the bearer with my blood, and…”

Elsa: “That allows you to shatter their minds?”

As if to affirm that inquiry, Sithonia nodded.

Then, she looked at Elsa from top to bottom,

Sithonia: “Even if it was just for half a year, it was a poison that would have cursed you so long as it dwelled in your possession. And yet, it bore no effect upon you. For you to be so special…”

Elsa: “—About that actually, I’m sorry.”

Interrupting Sithonia’s fracturing voice, Elsa shook her head from side-to-side. Then, she flicked up the charm held out by Sithonia with the tip of her knife.

Slicing it apart mid-air, what fell down from within was a fragrant stone dyed in red— catching it, Elsa sighed as she toyed with it in her hand.

And then—

Elsa: “The charm you gave me… to tell you the truth, I lost it the very day you gave it to me.”

Sithonia: “…Huh?”

Elsa: “I’m sorry. I thought you’d get mad at me, so I’d been carrying around a piece of cloth that looked similar. So, it’s only natural that your poison didn’t get through to me.”

Feigned as a proof of sisterhood, it had been bequeathed to her.

And due to losing it on the very day she had received it, she was unsure of just how much it would sadden Sithonia. Hence, Elsa had not revealed that fact to anybody.

And without ever having revealed it, she had arrived at the present day—

Elsa: “But, it seems like that was the deciding factor.”

Sithonia: “…Hah, hah. Geez, what in the world?”

Dejectedly, Sithonia, void of all strength, slumped her shoulders. She drew her knees close, pressed her forehead against those knees, and took a very, very long, deep breath.

Elsa: “Since Ornea treasured her sisters, she surely would have taken in a lot of poison, right?”

Sithonia: “And, you went and lost it… ahh, truly, you truly are…”

Elsa: “Lucky?”

Sithonia: “…The worst.”

With her forehead against her knees, Sithonia answered with nary a glance at Elsa's face. Elsa's lips curved at the cruel evaluation from the eldest daughter, and she thus closed her eyes, framed by long lashes.

Then, recalling the events of that night, of the night she killed Holosseo—

Elsa: "That day, if I'm remembering this right, he did tell me. That the ritual to achieve completion as a Curse Doll, slaughtering all the other sisters, was commencing. He said he had completed all the preparations for it."

Sithonia: "…Yes, I am aware. I found a note left behind in Father's office after you escaped from the water well. Hence, in order to ensure my victory…"

Elsa: "—There was no such need. I had no intention of killing anybody."

Hearing Elsa's response, Sithonia lifted her face from her knees with an "Eh". Looking into her red eyes whilst her own black ones housed a faint tinge of loneliness, Elsa continued.

Elsa: "A completed Curse Doll, a flawless, perfected existence… I don't particularly want to become that sort of thing."

Sithonia: "Why, is that? After all, if you do, you won't ever have to die…"

Elsa: "I don't want to become perfect. —You see, I always envied other people. I was jealous. I yearned. That's why, I don't want to be something like a completed Curse Doll."

She responded the same way she had to Holosseo's words on that night, and Sithonia was flabbergasted the same way that Holosseo had been. But, in his immediate fury, he declared that even if Elsa did not strive towards becoming a perfected Curse Doll, there was still a method to complete the ritual.

Being the puppeteer that he was, it would have been possible for him to pull some strings and cause Elsa's other sisters to die.

Elsa thought that he would do so, so she tried to do something in an attempt to change his mind.

Elsa: “But, thinking became difficult. And so, I used force.”

Sithonia: “…”

Elsa: “When I ended up killing him, I realized that I didn’t know what I should say to Dorothea, but it was already too late.”

That was the truth behind everything, and Elsa revealed it as a child would confess to their mischief.

For a short while, Sithonia spoke no words upon hearing the confession. Only, her red eyes flickering with her absence of speech, she slowly exhaled with a “Hah”.

Sithonia: “You were, truly, through to the bitter end… Elsa, and that’s all you could ever be.”

Elsa: “—? I think that’s a given, though.”

Sithonia spoke as if she had only just now noticed something that was completely obvious, causing Elsa to frown.

However, ignoring Elsa’s reaction, Sithonia nodded many times as if reaching comprehension, letting out an “Ahh” in soft wonder.

Sithonia: “From the very onset…”

Elsa: “—?”

Sithonia: “From the very onset, I was unfit to be playing a role in all these matters and affairs.”

A sorrowful, lonely conclusion it was. But, Sithonia’s expression was bright.

Listening to Sithonia’s answer, Elsa narrowed her eyes. Ascertaining the sensation of the curved blade in her hand, Elsa called out to Sithonia with a “Hey”, Elsa: “Now that we’ve cleared up our misunderstanding, do we make peace?”

Sithonia: “…Yes, indeed. Let us make peace. However…”

Elsa: “However?”

Sithonia: “I, want to end things here… No, I ask you to please end it for me.”

Lifting both her hands, Sithonia made her entreaty.

Receiving the words of she who desired death, Elsa muttered “How backwards”.

Elsa: “Even though you enacted such sinister plots because you wished not to die, you’re now turning all of that on its head?”

Sithonia: “It is because I finally understood that it would be impossible for me. But, there is a way to escape her dominion. That method is you, Elsa. —You are a Curse Doll who kills Curse Dolls.”

Pleading that she wished to be freed, Sithonia would accept Elsa’s malevolent blade. Bearing witness to that firm attitude, Elsa closed her eyes in resignation.

Elsa: “I don’t have confidence that it won’t hurt. I’m quite rough with how I handle blades.”

Sithonia: “I am aware… Attempting to educate you in domestic chores was a massive failure on my part.”

The girl who would be killed, cast a smile upon the girl who would kill her.

The elder sister who would be killed, and the younger sister who would kill. —Slowly, Elsa raised her blade aloft.

Elsa: “Do you have anything else you want to say?”

Sithonia: “…Once you kill me, you will be completed as a Curse Doll. You will end up being burdened with many terrible things, and just maybe…”

Elsa: “Your mother might come to meet me?”

Sithonia gazed in astonishment upon the ascertainment, giving a deep nod. Elsa understood Sithonia’s concern, however, she replied with “It’ll be alright”.

And, Elsa’s basis for that was—

Elsa: “—After all, I haven’t killed Ornea. That girl is still alive.”

Sithonia: “…Truly, what a hopeless girl you are…”

Upon Sithonia, sticking out her tongue in an odious manner, the downward swing of Elsa’s curved blade vigorously descended.

2

Gazing upon the now vacant Featherrun Mansion, Elsa slightly frowned.

The mansion had lost its lord, alongside the sisters who had succeeded its management. As concealed Hallowed Land, with its warden of the Gustekan Church having perished, this place would be converted into a sanctuary in a true sense.

???: “Gazing off with that absent-minded look, just what d’ye happen to be thinking about?”

???: “Ah, nothing major. Only, I was just thinking that it would burn quite nicely if set on fire.”

???: “As for why the heck ye’re thinking ‘bout burning it, I ain’t got a bloody clue.”

During her final battle against Sithonia, she had placed Oliver on standby outside the Hallowed Land. It would have been troubling to have him get involved, but then again, not involving him would be a dishonor.

Above all, there was a matter she had entrusted to Oliver.

That was—

Elsa: "—Ornea."

Thus, before Elsa's eyes as she turned her back on the mansion, curled up into a ball whilst sleeping on the roof of a dragon carriage, was a youthful, green-haired girl. —Of the Featherrun Sisters, Ornea Featherrun.

Having appeared to kill Elsa, the entirety of Ornea's skull had been crushed, leaving her defeated. But, her ability of regeneration would not accept death from her head merely being pulverised. However, even if her broken body had recovered, her shattered mind was beyond repair. That was simply how powerful Sithonia's poison had been.

Consequently, the Ornea who had become a different person from the Ornea before, was just like a baby.

Ornea: "Uu."

Elsa: "Moaning and groaning… It's somewhat like a replacement for Tatiana."

As Ornea groaned in displeasure, curled up into a ball, Elsa smiled. But, it seemed like Oliver had not been very fond of her comment, and he called "Elsa" to her in a sharp voice,

Oliver: "Quit it, would ye? There's nobody who can serve as a replacement for someone else."

Elsa: "That's not something I'd ever think to hear from a slaver who supplies manpower."

Oliver: "Tsk. There, wipe your face with this. For a lass of your age to be so damn bloodied…"

Elsa evaluated him with her usual lip service, to which Oliver clicked his tongue and tossed her a hand towel. Wetting it in the snow, Elsa vigorously wiped her bloodied face and hair.

As Elsa did so, Oliver asked her "What ye gonna do from here?"

Elsa: “From here?”

Oliver: “Ye’ve settled the issue with the sister who’s been targeting ye, yeah? In that case, ye’re officially a free woman… please don’t tell me ye’re gonna return to being my merchandise.”

Elsa: “Oh my, would that not be fine?”

Oliver: “I’ll beg off that. This was the final straw, I learned my lesson alongside my fingers.”

Holding up his hands short of a few fingers, Oliver was fed up, and forsook Elsa. At those words of separation that encompassed his true feelings, with neither a parting threat nor making excuses, Elsa felt a bit lonely.

Since becoming a slave, she had returned to him thirteen times, forming a bizarre relationship between slave and slaver; that would end here. Through that sense of loneliness, Elsa finally realized something.

Elsa: “I’m surprised. I suppose I was rather fond of you.”

Oliver: “What a preposterous thing to say. As for me, I’m completely sick ‘n tired of it.”

As Elsa’s lips broke into a smile fit for a girl, Oliver also wore a cheerful grin.

And then, he turned his eyes to the mansion Elsa had wanted to set on fire,

Oliver: “If the people of the Gustekan Church don’t know ‘bout this place, then would it be fine for me to take it? It’s tough living in Innorandum, and I’ve been wanting a new house.”

Elsa: “Yeah, I don’t suppose why not? This place is constructed more luxuriously than other plots of Hallowed Land, and it would surely be easy for your new slaves to live in. I can guarantee that as a progenitor slave who lived here for a while.”

Oliver: “…Did I say anything about continuing to be a slaver?”

Wiping her face, Elsa moved to stand next to Oliver, and he cast her a puzzled look. Looking back at his face, Elsa tilted her head with an “Oh my”,

Elsa: “You’re retiring? But, you’re only Oliver because you’re a slaver. If that very Oliver retires from being a slaver, what in the world are you going to become?”

Oliver: “…”

Elsa: “First of all, if you’re retiring, why did you follow me? The only reason you would have followed me to the point of losing your fingers, would be because I belong to you… isn’t that right, master?”

Oliver: “…Please, don’t ye call me such a disgusting thing.”

As Elsa looked up at him with a beautifully sweet smile, Oliver sighed. Then, after groaning for a while, he covered his face in resignation,

Oliver: “Probably, it’s exactly as ye say. I’m a slaver till I die. Since I didn’t die, even if my limbs are torn off, I’ll continue this work. So that eventually—”

Elsa: “You can make both you and your slaves, make everyone happy… I think it’s foolish.”

Oliver: “Say what you please.”

Elsa: “But, it’s wonderful.”

The final words she appended had caught Oliver off-guard. Seeing Oliver wear such an expression, Elsa tossed him the bloodied hand towel.

As Oliver screamed out “Bwahh!”, Elsa turned her back on him, and began to walk forward.

Sidestepping the dragon carriage in which Ornea was sleeping, she headed towards the cavern. —Towards the exit. Leaving this plot of Hallowed Land out into the snowfield, in order to head for somewhere not here.

Oliver: “Elsa, where ye headed?”

Elsa: “Who knows? Come to think of it, I’ve never stopped being a slave before, so there was never anything I wanted to do, nor places I wanted to go. And so…”

Oliver: “And so?”

Elsa: “First of all, I’ll look for somewhere that isn’t cold.”

Even if it was the homeland to which she was born, there was no such thing as getting used to this wintry soil. Cold things were cold. And Elsa loathed both snow and blizzards.

Since she hated them so very much, she treasured the warmth that allowed her to forget.

Seeking that out, Elsa stepped forward.

Elsa: “—Oliver, be well. Get along nicely with Ornea, will you?”

Oliver: “Yeah. Elsa, ye be healthy as well, aight…? Don’t go catching a cold now, ye foolhardy lass.”

In the place she had lived as a Featherrun Sister, those were the final words of parting between Elsa the merchandise, and the slaver who treated her oh so dearly.

3

Leaving Oliver and Ornea behind at the Hallowed Land, she passed through the cavern, and emerged out into the snowfield.

She was thinking to make for a nearby town on foot, and there enact the adequate preparations for her journey, before then attempting to leave the country. Her destination could have been anywhere, it mattered not. She would aim for a land outside this nation of frost, one of warmth.

For a land where none knew of the Featherrun Sisters, and where none targeted Curse Dolls.

However—

???: "—No matter how you look at it, wouldn't that just be way too convenient?"

A voice came falling upon Elsa right after she parted from the Hallowed Land, and set foot on the snowfield.

The shrill voice, making no effort to conceal its disdain and ridicule towards her, was quite frankly, a cluster of malice.

Elsa: "…"

The source from which the voice had descended quite literally covered the sky, causing Elsa to widen her eyes. Most things would fail to shake Elsa, but naturally, even she could not help but feel surprised by this.

After all, enshrined by the snowy mist right before Elsa's eyes, was a singular black dragon flapping its mighty wings.

Elsa: "…A dragon?"

Dragon: "Ohoho, why, even a bumpkin like you, Gusteko born and raised, recognizes and despises us on sight? As expected, I guess we dragons truly are so magnificent! Kyahahahaha-!"

Flapping its wings, the dragon slowly descended upon the snow, clad in jet-black scales as it was.

Its large body, quite likely seven or eight meters, was suitably intimidating, but what troubled Elsa further was the voice and demeanor that was completely at odds with its stern outward appearance.

It was not that she wanted it to be overflowing with majesty, but it was not a pleasant feeling to watch it clamoring about like an impudent young girl. However—

Dragon: "Heh~? If you can tell how terrifying and amazing this lovely lady is at a single glance, then your eyes must be pretty damn good for a piece of rotten meat."

By nature, a dragon's face was supposed to be difficult to read expressions from, however, it ridiculed her with an abundance of emotive expressions, looking down on her.

Fortunately, it was not in Elsa's nature to immediately feel anger at being shown disdain or contempt.

Moreover, regarding the black dragon that had appeared all of a sudden under these circumstances, she possessed an inkling as to its identity.

Elsa: "You…"

Dragon: "Ahhhnn? What? What business have you with this lovely lady? Talking back are we? Saying that I piss you off and that you hate me? Oh dear, oh dear, rebellious pieces of rotten meat like you are this lovely lady's absolute favourite! Crushing and pulverizing them, then massacring them along with all their friends and family…"

Elsa: "Are you, the mother whom Sithonia spoke of?"

Precisely upon hearing that, the black dragon ceased its movement. Then, casting its red eyes down upon Elsa, the black dragon properly perceived her for the first time.

Dragon: "The fact that you came outta there means there's no doubt that that other piece of rotten meat was disgracefully and boorishly defeated… let's see now, this is curiously troubling for this lovely lady."

Elsa: "Is that because you failed to get your hands on a Curse Doll?"

Dragon: "No no no no, that's all wrong! I mean, the likes of a Curse Doll was nothing more than an extra prize for this lovely lady to begin with! Given the opportunity! That which this lovely lady had wanted, was something else entirely!"

Elsa: "Something else? That would be…"

Dragon: “Isn’t it obvious? —It’s love. Love.”

That which the black dragon had spoken had been exceedingly, indeed, exceedingly grand.

Love; thus spoke the black dragon. From Sithonia, that it had desired.

Dragon: “That was my daughter. As my daughter, she ought to exert her entire body and soul in order to grant her mother’s desires. And then, display her love towards me for the first time! It is love which I desire, love that would do its utmost to deliver unto me treasures beyond my wildest imaginations.”

Akin to a lovestruck dame, akin to a poet yearning for love, the black dragon’s throat quavered in desire of unseen treasure. That way of being was absurd, and simultaneously did it appear as a terribly twisted and unsightly thing.

It was not like Elsa had lived in a way to take pride in for the most part either, but—

Elsa: “You’re quite the dangerously selfish person, aren’t you?”

The scent of fear that had pervaded Sithonia. She had plotted to kill the mother who controlled her by seeking an undying body, the completion of the Curse Dolls; Elsa finally understood her motives.

And with that understanding, Elsa, for the first time, pitied Sithonia from the bottom of her heart.

If she had wished to escape the bindings of this mother, then she ought to have ran away instead of trying to fight back. Had she thrown caution to the wind and attempted to escape for dear life, how much better things might have been.

Had she done so, then such a thing like killing her sisters and dying without obtaining anything in the end would have never—

Dragon: “—You’re an annoyingly interesting piece of rotten meat, aren’t you?”

Elsa: "…Is that so? Though, same as Sithonia, weren't incomplete Curse Dolls not to your liking?"

Dragon: "I'm kind. And so, I'll repeat something I already said a second time. I've got no interest in stuff like immortal beings. For starters, I've already gotten my hands on one a long time ago."

While speaking, the form of the black dragon before her eyes slowly began to morph. Bones creaking and flesh constricting, the black dragon's body withered away like something out of a nightmare.

Then, the shrunken flesh of the black dragon writhed, and that which emerged anew was the form of a young girl.

A girl of golden hair, and eyes of red. The black dragon had morphed into a girl that appeared to be around the same age as Elsa, and now gazed upon her with a cute yet savage smile.

Girl: "I collect the most outstanding, extraordinary, and deranged children. With every ability one possesses being a matter of merely being the right person in the right place, I bestow meaning in life to the monsters who can't live in the sun. I'm going to make you one of my daughters as well."

Elsa: "…Do I have the right to refuse that, I wonder?"

Girl: "I don't particularly care if you refuse, but… in that case, I'd be heartbroken at the rejection, and would do anything it takes to soothe my heart, you know? For example—"

With a callous grin, the black dragon shifted its gaze behind Elsa—to the cavern, and the Hallowed Land within.

If it had been in contact with Sithonia, then Elsa's battle formation would have also been leaked to this black dragon. Thus, that would have also included the fact that Oliver and Ornea, with whom Elsa had just parted, had been left behind there.

Elsa: "Even if those two were to die, it's not like I'd die. Did you think that would serve as a threat?"

Girl: "Don't lump me in together with your poorly-crafted sisters.

Whether or not they would suffice for a threat isn't something decided by me, but by you."

The situation was a recreation of the time at the snowy plaza when Saria and Hildea had taken Oliver hostage. —No, considering the poor personality at play, it was far worse.

Elsa: "…"

Witnessing Elsa's silence, the black dragon smiled darkly and proffered a hand. Seeking a handshake, it was not. With the back of its hand oriented upward, it was demanding Elsa's submission.

Girl: "Well, shouldn't you be giving a kiss to your lovely mother's hand?"

At those words, Elsa hesitated on whether or not to draw her dagger, but ceased. —It felt as if she had heard Tatiana's voice.

Henceforth, Elsa kneeled down on the spot, complying with Mother's demands, and planted a kiss on the back of her hand.

Girl: "Your name?"

To take one as a daughter without even knowing that, was a great laughing matter.

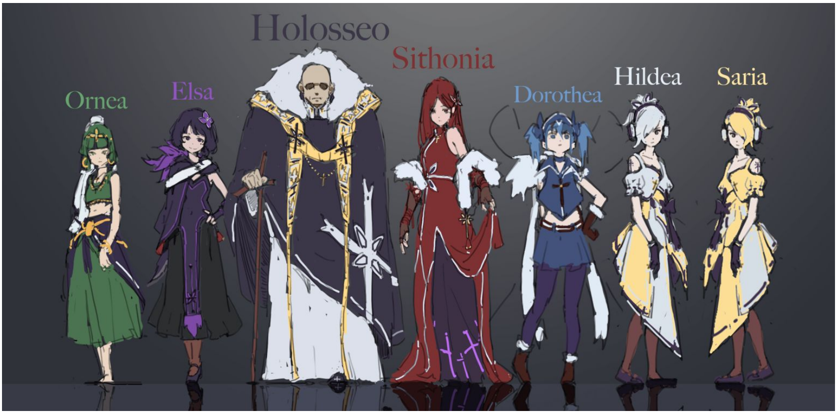
However, Elsa raised her face without laughing. Then, gazing at the wicked face of her mother up close,

Elsa: "I am Elsa Featherrun. No, scratch that. —My, name is…"

Cutting off her words there, Elsa closed her eyes.

What flashed through her mind was a cold snowfield, and the warmth of the first moment Elsa had felt alive—

And, the genesis of that warmth was—



Epilogue:
Elsa Granhiert

—When she had first found the girl, it had been a scene pervaded by a terrible reek of blood.

???: "…"

The wordless toddler sat alone upon the bloody stream that had become of the meadow.

From behind the dark blue hair that had been permitted to run wild, it was apparent that her widened eyes were looking in her direction. The florid skin characteristic of young children was smeared with mud and grime; a shabby figure clad in naught but a coarse rag.

Dressed in a rag sullied by rain and human waste, it was obvious at a glance that she had not been living in a decent manner, but the awful stench of that filth was overpowered by something else.

—That had been a dusky blood, accompanied by the putrescent malodor of death.

In the vicinity of the child, innumerable corpses were sprawled. A horrid mountain of corpses, with heads severed, arms and legs twisted off, and torsos ripped open.

Numbering more than ten or even twenty, it would be no exaggeration to say the horde itself had been entirely engulfed by death. The aroma of blood and death filling the meadow was far too antithetical to the presence of the young child.

The greater region containing this meadow was known to be a perilous frontier inhabited by herds of Witchbeasts.

A few years prior, there existed a small village in the vicinity, but as the Witchbeasts expanded their living territory, the residents all evacuated and left the buildings behind. Therefore, it was rare for people to visit this place, and even supposing someone were to pass through, more likely than not it would be for the purposes of some wicked scheme.

For that reason, it was not uncommon for those who carelessly made use of this frontier to end up as corpses. And though rare, it was still possible for a young child to be present there. If a slaver had decided to enter and brave the danger for the purposes of avoiding the public eye, such a thing was entirely possible.

However, it was indeed strange for the corpses scattered about to be not that of humans, but rather the remains of Witchbeasts.

Thus, before the eyes of the blood-stained toddler, the presence of the girl standing next to the mountain of corpses—

???: “A warmer welcome than I could have ever imagined. Though, I had no intention of causing you any harm.”

The girl, standing at the heart of the bloody stream upon the Witchbeast corpse-strewn meadow, looked back at the toddler.

She was a tall, fair-skinned young girl, with her long black hair in a braid. In her mid-teens, the curvature of her body had developed in a manner most feminine, and about her hung an immoral allure in the interval between mature and immature.

If entranced by those deep black eyes, many men would find themselves unable to resist.

Though, that was only conceivable if she was not smeared in vast amounts of Witchbeast blood.

Child: “Phu, uuu…!!”

Glaring at the black-haired girl, the bloodied toddler grit her teeth in loathing.

In the toddler’s gaze, there was no fragment of gratitude towards the fact that she had been rescued from dangerous Witchbeasts. That was likely because the toddler did not see the Witchbeasts as enemies. It would also have been difficult to label them as family, though.

Only, in this place where no adults were around to protect the child, in order to survive in the perilous frontier crawling with Witchbeasts, there would have been no other choice but to coexist with those enemies of humanity.

As the Witchbeasts she had coexisted with were put to slaughter, the toddler’s heart must have fallen into unfathomable devastation.

However—

Girl: “Are you angry that I’ve made a mess of your home?”

As the very perpetrator of the Witchbeast massacre, the girl displayed not a fragment of sympathy or understanding of the anger harbored by the child.

With her head inclined, the girl gazed down upon the toddler whose breathing had grown rough,

Girl: “When you act like that, you really do look just like a Witchbeast, just like I heard about from outside. The rumored Queen who conquered the Witchbeasts… rather than a Queen, you’re more like a Princess.”

Child: “Phu-, phu-”

Girl: “If you can’t speak, then I suppose you might not be understanding what I’m saying either. Unfortunately, I’ve been instructed to bring you back. So, I’ll be having you come together with me. Even if you hate it, I'll be taking you back alive. If you don't resist, this can end without injury."

Child: "Uu~! Uuuuu~!"

Girl: "Not going to listen, huh? In that case, through what means are you going to refuse me?"

The child seemed to be throwing a tantrum, to which the girl loosened her lips.

Normally, when confronted with a person who could not be conversed with, people would feel irritation and impatience, but there were no such signs on the girl's expression. Only, there was something akin to dear nostalgia.

That only served to spur on the toddler's rage.

Child: "…"

At the behest of anger, the child fervently clapped her hands. — Directly afterwards, a large shadow leaped upon the meadow, as if having awaited that signal; it was a dark Witchbeast with the face of a lion with twisted horns.

Extolled as the jet-black King of the forest, it was a Witchbeast whose fiendish nature went without peer, the Guiltilaw.

Guiltilaw: "—AROOOO!"

The breath of a thundering roar explosively assailed the girl with a raw fragrance. In wonder at the Witchbeast's arrival and its overwhelming ghastliness, the girl went on to lick her own lips.

Girl: "Quite the big friend you've got. Wonderful, how absolutely wonderful."

A life-threatening peril before her, the girl's demeanour had been exceedingly aloof.

Seemingly irritated by that fact, the Guiltilaw brandished its bestial claws aloft, intent on delivering a tremendous blow to the girl. But

—

Girl: “That’s no good, with such a way of doing things. You have to be more gentle with girls, you see.”

Guiltilaw: “—AROO?!”

The Witchbeast’s front paw missed its mark, before dancing through the air alongside the girl’s smile.

Losing a leg in exchange for having used its full strength, the Witchbeast readjusted its focus after being flustered, and glared at the girl. And with the beast’s glare upon her, the girl slowly readied her sinister curved blade,

Girl: “A body so big it can’t be compared to humans… I’m looking forward to seeing what sort of insides are contained within.”

—What followed was a brutally one-sided battle, merciless to the extreme.

Girl: “—This marks the end.”

Just as the smiling girl had declared, the collapsed Witchbeast had already forfeited the majority of its vitality.

Having been completely dominated, the Witchbeast had not only lost the initial front paw, but its hind legs and tail as well. With no signs of its outpouring blood coming to a stop, its throat, which had previously given rise to a mighty roar, could now only let out weak whimpers.

The moment it had lagged behind in the initial clash, the victor had been decided. The feeble cries of the Witchbeast’s throat seemed as if it were even begging to be beheaded and put out of its misery.

But then again, as the girl was fatally poor at understanding emotions, the Witchbeast’s desperate pleas did not reach her.

Consequently, until its very last moments, the Witchbeast’s life was doomed to be toyed with by the girl.

Girl: “Does its poor color result from a problem with its diet, I wonder? Or is it just a characteristic of this one? Its stench is also terrible, but I’d like to compare it with other Witchbeasts… Are you going to call out a different one?”

Playing with the bowels of the slain Witchbeast, the girl questioned the toddler while inspecting the entrails with the tip of her curved blade. But, judging by the reaction of the child, who sank to the floor, there was no indication of any greater Witchbeast being played as a trump card.

Girl: “I see, so it’s over… That’s too bad.”

Taking the wordless hatred as a response, the girl was visibly disappointed.

Then, disappointed as she was, the girl approached the tense child —

Child: “—Aa-.”

Girl: “You don’t need to worry, I told you that I’d bring you back with me, right? It’s not that I don’t have any interest in your insides, but they’re not so appealing that I’d disobey instructions for them. Rest assured.”

Child: “Uu! UUU~! UU~U!”

Girl: “…When you hate me that much, I’ll be hurt. Wounds to the heart aren’t so quick to recover, you see.”

Carried under her arm, the child desperately writhed in resistance. However, the resistance of a skinny, malnourished toddler was not capable of bringing the girl to a halt.

Child: “Gau, uuu~.”

Girl: “I understand your feelings of wanting to kill me, but it would be impossible with your strength. Even if you gnaw on the back of my neck, it just tickles… it would be best for you to prioritize getting well first.”

The child was biting at her white nape, but the best her weak jaw could do was leave teeth marks.

Shrugging her shoulders at the ticklishness, the girl loosened her lips upon recalling something, and giggled to herself.

Girl: “Ah, apologies. I’m not laughing at you. Only, in the past I once spent time with a girl who couldn’t speak, just like you… Perhaps kids who can’t speak just tend to be the violent ones. That girl was also very hot-headed, you see.”

Still biting down, the toddler weakly pressed her nails into the girl’s neck and back. It was something akin to quarreling with a kitten, so the girl paid it no heed.

Slowly, whilst carrying the child, the girl stepped through the blood-soaked meadow, and moved toward the outside.

To somewhere not here, to a place unsecluded, to the wider world.

Girl: “It’s not a decent place, and I don’t know if you’ll have freedom or not. It might very well be far more comfortable for you to keep living here, but since you were noticed, you’d better give up, as there’s no helping it.”

Child: “Uu~! Fgwuu~!”

Girl: “There’s not really anything in particular that I can say or do for… ah, there’s one thing.”

Tearing the squirming child from her shoulder, she locked eyes with the hate-clouded irises right before her. Once they got out of here, she decided she would first put her in a hot bath, and then—

Girl: “I’m Elsa. Elsa Granhiert.”

Child: “…”

Girl: “Though I don’t know just how long we will end up being acquainted, that was just the one thing I had to say… after all, between the two of us, I’m the older sister.”

Saying that, the girl— Elsa Granhiert, joyfully smiled at her future little sister.

END

Afterword

Yes, we've reached the afterword! It's ya boy, Nagatsuki Tappei! Also known as the grey-colored cat!

There we have it, the anime disk bonus novel! Last time, for the first season of the anime, I was asked to write something, and now they're having me do it again! This too is thanks to all of your support!

Following the trend from last time, I'm writing in a style different to the usual main story, in which someone other than Natsuki Subaru is filling the position of protagonist.

For this first one, I decided to write the story of everyone's favourite Elsa Granhiert.

Because it's the first bonus novel for Season 2, I also had the view that "A story that's just about Elsa running rampant as she pleases, how would that work well as a bonus novel?", but they only gave me the condition that as long as the disk bonus somewhat connects to the contents of Season 2, it's OK to write anything!

Though it might be more accurate to say that I went and wrote to my heart's content…!

Thus, we have arrived at the publication of "Apocalypse Girls" this time!

I'm going to get into spoilers on the assumption that you've already read all the way until the afterword, but the contents are basically "Elsa-san runs as rampant as she pleases in her homeland of the North."

Originally, my expectation when I began writing was that it would depict how a normal girl known as Elsa Granhiert came to become the being known as the Bowel Hunter.

However, when I actually set out to put it to paper, Elsa-san's personality from the outset ended up being the same as it is currently, so my initial plans came crumbling down at the prologue. It seems that the reason why Elsa-san is Elsa-san, was decided at the very moment of her birth.

Since that also delivered quite the shock to the author himself, I considered how the story might proceed, so even if she was predisposed to be the Bowel Hunter by birth, I decided to focus on the details regarding how she gained her physical consitution, and how she ended up in her current position. That is what led to this story.

North of Re: Zero's main stage, the Kingdom of Lugunica, there lies the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, which despite being listed among the Four Great Countries, will likely never appear in Re: Zero's main story.

The previous anime disk bonus was written with the stage set in the Kararagi City-States, which will not appear much either, but with this sort of arrangement, settings that were supposed to be in limbo outside the main story are being brought out to the forefront, so I think it's a win-win for both the author and readers.

This time too, it was a lot of fun to write about this and that about the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko!

The people placed in an environment of harsh, extreme cold, and the firm religion deeply rooted there. In order to survive in a world of white cold, the girl throws herself into an unwanted battle—when it's written like that, Elsa-san seems like a heroine carrying an extremely tragic resolve, but the fact that she actually enjoys those circumstances, is something that everyone who has read the main story already knows.

She is also a key player who stole the "First Death" of Subaru, the main story's protagonist, so it would be no exaggeration to say that her existence dictated the forward course of "Re: Zero – Starting Life in Another World" as a piece of fiction. It was truly enjoyable to write about her.

Well then, I am repeating myself here, but the reason I was able to write this work was thanks to everyone whose support allowed for us to be blessed with the opportunity for a second anime adaptation.

Starting with Director Watanabe, the cooperation of everyone who's part of the large anime staff and cast made it possible to adapt the fourth arc, which was considered to be quite difficult.

It's jam packed with new characters and new developments, so deciding what to keep and what to depict, doing the utmost to come up with various ways to direct things, the author always loses himself in a trance while watching.

If that passion and intrest of the story is transmitted to everyone watching, and perhaps left behind some strong emotions in their hearts, then there is nothing greater to be hoped for.

This bonus novel is a thank you to everyone involved with making such a wonderful anime, and might be my maxium involvement with the anime as the original author.

Of course, I'm also giving my all to writing the disk bonus novel planned for later. I hope all the fans can love my work in its entirety!

And with that it looks like I've hit the end of the page. So let us move on to the usual thank yous.

To Editor I, for the go-sign you gave while diluting your words with "The bonus, I know I said you could write whatever you wanted, but…", thank you very much! Likewise, I responded "Is this really fine for the first one?" while tiling my head, but I think it was a dialogue quite fitting for an author and his editor! For the remaining bonuses as well, I'll do my best!

Illustrator Ootsuka-sensei, I could say that it was thanks to inspiration from your wonderful visual of Elsa Granhiert that I was able to write this story. Truly, thank you very much!

And this will be another repeat, but I give huge thanks to everyone involved with making the wonderful anime. For working with such hard material, thank you so much!

Above all, to all the fans who have supported the work until this point, accompanying me even as far as reading a bonus novel, I give my greatest thanks of all!

Well then, let us meet again in the next bonus novel!

Loving the Days Gone By

Prologue:
First Cry

—The moment she opened her eyes, what first dawned upon her was the doubt of What Thing her self was.

Enigmatically, she possessed knowledge.

If she were to define it, then she was currently in a state wherein simply the receptacle for the soul had been prepared.

In order to initiate something, the receptacle plastered with foundation for knowledge and skills had been prepared, lacking only its pivotal content—no, it had finally been inserted was what the condition was.

If she thought of being able to start walking, she could've walked. If she thought of being able to start talking, she could've talked.

However, the will that sought to perform those inevitabilities was also insufficient, and for that reason she was unable to move.

"…"

A room which had the impression of being queerly empty, with circles drawn on the ground glowing fleetingly. She understood it was a pattern for some kind of magic-esque technique, but she was ignorant as to what it specifically was.

The reason why her self was at the center of this light, was because her self had taken birth here.

Her self, who was yet to be Something had been born, and without even voicing a first cry, was examining the state of her surroundings.

"…"

Straining her eyes in the dim indoors, what she could see were books tightly packed in shelves, and many kinds of materials scattered on the floor, affirming those, she finally took notice.

Of the shadow staring down towards her self, as she stood within the light.

“…”

Long, white hair, such transient beauty that would seemingly crumble upon a single touch, the lady garbed in black clothing running contrary to the impression of her hair, stood there wielding a definite aura of presence.

Why, was she not livened up by a person so beautiful and bewitching. The reason was obvious.

Just as light far too powerful could not be imagined, she had merely overlooked what was too great.

That was not anything so outwardly as her presence or her shimmering beauty, but that she was something meaning greatly to her self, who was yet to be Something.

—That she was someone irreplaceable to her self, who was not Anything.

“—Ah.”

Her lips tried to vocalize something, trembling weakly, they spilled out a sigh.

The embankment was destroyed at once, the collapse thereafter perceptible immediately.

“Ah, a~a~h… a~a~a~h.”

Voice impossible of being vocalized overflowed, something warm trickled down from the corner of her eyes.

She possessed no means to halt her voice, halt her tears.

That which spilled out, that which trickled out, was the supernatant of the soul impossible of being contained within this receptacle. Shedding them in their entirety, finally, the soul matched oneself with the receptacle.

With this, at last, it shall all commence.

At last, her self, who was not Anything, her self, who had emitted her first cry, shall…

“—Good morning.”

Suddenly, a voice that was not her own resonated, and raising her trembling chin, she lifted her gaze.

A blurred field of vision, the form of that person that had been vividly visible till earlier was no longer visible, and frantically rubbing her eyes, she searched, searched, searched for the figure of that person…

“—You are, Beatrice.”

The voice told her, as a hand supported the cheek of the lost child.

Holding her breath, she gazed at the beauty before her eyes. That person, curved her lips in somewhat perturbation. With a delay, she realized it was a smile coming from this gauche person.

“—You are my, let’s see. Something akin to a daughter.”

Chapter 1:
Chased by the Spherical Moon

1

???: “Beatrice-sama, how did you formerly lead your life?”

The nonchalant question hurled at her, Beatrice slowly lifted her face.

This had been just about the time of awaiting supper, as she sat in front of the fire with an open book on her lap. Before her eyes, putting the hotpot on the fire was the one spending identical time on this land, Ryuzu.

A rare half-elf, the young girl conferred with an indispensable duty in the Sanctuary. Nowadays, Beatrice had been frequently acting together with her and spending time together.

This being per ordinary, they had been leisurely spending time of boredom together.

Beatrice: “…You, what is it that you intend, I suppose.”

Ryuzu: “Um… was that a strange question on my part?”

Beatrice: “It’s not about being strange, in fact. Simply, for you to probe into Betty, just what are you plotting, I suppose. Confess with honesty, and you shall be let off without facing much, in fact.”

Ryuzu: “For me to be plotting something, that is out of the question…!”

Holding the spoon for stirring the hotpot close to her chest, with long pink hued hair, Ryuzu acted ashamed.

A young girl unsuited to secrets. She was docile when facing Beatrice as well, and the latter wanted to trust her when she said she was not plotting anything—but she shan’t let her guard down.

Beatrice: “At any rate, Roswaal would stoop to any level if it is for teasing Betty, I suppose.”

Ryuzu: “Ah, so you were concerned about that…”

Beatrice: “There, that reaction! Your face says you happen to know something, in fact!”

She pointed a finger at Ryuzu, who seemed to consent, displaying a bitter smile. Afterwards, Ryuzu said, “It’s a misunderstanding” and put the spoon back into the hotpot.

Ryuzu: “Just now, I simply thought that I certainly agree with Beatrice-sama’s thoughts. Because it seems Roswaal-sama finds Beatrice-sama to be so cute that he just cannot help it.”

Beatrice: “What a mistaken idea, I suppose. You are also blind to an astounding degree, in fact. He is just nasty, that is all, I suppose.”

Ryuzu: “Is that so? I believe Roswaal-sama thinks of Beatrice-sama as his younger sister…”

Beatrice: “D-Don’t say anything so repulsive, in fact!”

The book interposed in her lap, Beatrice grasped her slim shoulders as she felt shivers run through her body.

Ryuzu’ poor vision was also grievous. For her to say Beatrice and Roswaal were siblings.

Beatrice: “To begin with, Betty does have a more proper sibling… Bubby, I suppose. If Bubby were also to be considered in furriness and cuteness, something like Roswaal wouldn’t even stand a chance, in fact.”

Ryuzu: “Bubby… elder brother, you mean? Beatrice-sama’s? In other words, Echidna-sama’s?”

Beatrice: “Things are a little bit complicated when it comes to that detail, I suppose.”

Ryuzu’ question, as she rounded her eyes, likely alluded to whether

Beatrice's elder brother was also Echidna's child—in other words, if they were true siblings.

In that sense, realizing a sibling relationship with a Spirit's disposition was difficult. However, in the sense of being born through the same technique and to the same parent, Beatrice indeed had an elder brother.

Beatrice: "That is, Betty's precious Bubby, I suppose"

Ryuzu: "…What kind of a person is he? Please tell me as well."

Beatrice: "Mgh…"

Her eyes twinkling, keenly interested, Ryuzu implored Beatrice.

This gaze of Ryuzu' was Beatrice's weakness. Above all, Beatrice being weak to gazes of this kind was not limited to Ryuzu' alone.

Beatrice: "Geez, what a hopeless girl, I suppose. Such insolence, in fact!"

Ryuzu: "Well then…!"

Beatrice: "Before that! Be careful of the hotpot's flame, I suppose. If you become engrossed in listening and burn the supper then it will be a problem to Mother, in fact."

The dinner Ryuzu was preparing was to be given out to people involved with the Sanctuary as a feast.

Ryuzu' cooking was actually the most delicious in this settlement. Everyone has their specialties. Though Spirits were not required to eat meals, they could comprehend taste, and could also reduce food into mana.

In secret, Beatrice had also been looking forward to the supper Ryuzu would make.

Beatrice: "So, don't burn it, I suppose!"

Ryuzu: "I understand. Well then, what story are you going to let me hear?”

Beatrice: “How self-serving, in fact… If that’s the case, then Betty will tell you about a while back, I suppose.”

A tale coming from the topic of her elder brother. If so, Beatrice shall talk about the days she spent with her elder brother.

Back when the Sanctuary had not been created yet, and she had not even met Roswaal, the time Beatrice had lived through, having been born as the daughter of the Witch, alongside her solitary elder brother.

And, the reason why Beatrice became such that she would look forward to suppers, like humans.

A short glance at Ryuzu, whose eyes were twinkling and cheeks dyed red in anticipation, and Beatrice sighed.

Beatrice: “That was, back when Betty had been entrusted with the house during Mother’s absence, in fact.”

2

???: “Aaaow.”

She raised her voice and crouched down upon the impact that landed on the top of her head.

What had directly hit the area of the whorls of hair on the rear of her head was a single book that fell as she was pulling it out.

The indolence behind her claim of being able to obtain it from the upper row of the bookshelf without a stepladder gave rise to calamity, and as she stood on her tiptoes stretching for above, she ultimately had to catch the book which slipped through her fingers with her head.

???: “Wh-What a disaster, I suppose… how audacious for a mere book, in fact…”

The book was quite a large one by itself, its impact had been nothing short of hefty. But, to admit that would mark the further increase of her own miserableness, the girl sourly refused to admit defeat before the book lying on the floor.

Above all, the faint tears accumulated in those large eyes of her's lost her of any convincibility.

—She was a young girl in possession of characteristic eyes of a bluish tint and symbolic patterns resembling butterflies visible on them.

Big, round eyes along with prickly, unruffled, well-ordered facial features, possessing a face and figure of approximately ten years of age, the young child who gave the impression that she shall become a charming beauty in the future was garbed in an extravagant dress. Her pale hued hair carefully rolled, the girl's figure was as though a princess from a picture book.

???: "Geez, you may be a book, but you lack the self-awareness of being Mother's property, I suppose. That is why you brought this chaos upon Betty, in fact."

The sweet albeit young girl picked the fallen book up and cleared away the dust on its binding whilst making excuses that went unheard by anyone. —The book was one with black binding, with no title on its cover.

Its contents were unknown at a glance, but when the young girl put her fingers, which she had cleared the dust on the cover away with, and contemplated, a faint light gave rise to letters. It was the book's title. Simply Mana I was written on it.

???: "Letters written with dregs of mana… though it is for the purpose of not being able to be read by those who do not have aptitude for mana, Mother's watchfulness is per expectation, I suppose."

Murmuring thoughts bristling with reverence, the girl opened the bulky book. Though within it were nothing but blank pages, letters appeared on them upon contemplation identical to how they had on the cover.

Magical books that could only be read by those who could utilize mana, were plentifully lined up in the shelf before her eyes—no, in the infinite number of bookshelves that comprised the young girl's environs.

A library packed with magical books of such nature, to those with no groundings they were worthless blank books.

Contrariwise, it was a mountain of treasure possessing inestimable worth for those qualified. The young girl harbored pride in having been given the right to freely enter and exit this library.

Just how many humans across the world would thirst for the key to this treasury of knowledge.

A sense of supremacy for having been bestowed with what could not be gained with ease, even upon wishing for it. However, it was simply natural she would be the object to this favorable treatment. For the young girl was—

???: "The one and only daughter, of the great Mother, in fact."

???: "—Oh, in the midst of studying, are you, Betty?"

???: "—!"

As she puffed up her chest out of slight self-regard, the young girl's shoulders sprung in astonishment upon hearing the voice. The book dropped from her hands once again, this time striking her tiptoes.

Shouting "Ukya!", the young girl reflexively crouched on the spot.

???: "Ah, Betty, I'm sorry. All because I called out to you out of nowhere…"

???: "I-I-I…-It, doesn't, hurt, I suppose… ~hk."

???: "Hm hm, you sure are a strong girl. Now, show me your foot."

Tightly gnashing her molars, the young girl braved the pain. What gently descended whilst fluttering right before her eyes was a kitten of grey colored fur levitating in the air.

The kitten lengthened its tail that was around the same length as its body and softly pointed its end towards the young girl's hurting tiptoes. And, a pale light was emitted, its warmth gradually healed her pain.

???: "No~w, pain pain go awa~y… did it go away?"

???: "… It's gone away, in fact. Thank you, I suppose."

???: "All 'cause I surprised you, after all. Doing this much is a matter of course."

The kitten accepted her gratitude with an affluent smile whilst putting a hand on its waist.

Holding the fallen book in her arms once again, the girl stood up and looked into the eyes of the kitten.

Of a size enough to sit on a palm and capable of comprehending human speech was the kitten—it was not precisely a kitten. To the utmost, its shape and form merely resembled a lovable cat, its true state was that of a further exalted being.

A Spirit living by using mana, the primal power swaying across this world, as a source of energy was what the kitten was.

But for the young girl, there existed a further appropriate name for it.

???: "For pity's sake, Bubby sure is an oversleeper, in fact. It's already past noon, I suppose."

???: "Sorry, sorry. I accidentally got too much at ease. See, I resemble a cat, right? So, I fail to resist the instinct of wanting to laze around when I find a nice, sunny spot."

The girl referred to the mischievously grinning kitten as "Bubby"—big brother. An outsider may observe the kitten and the girl refer to each other in an odd fashion, but there was nothing uncanny about it.

The young girl and the kitten, were a recherché set of siblings born in the same manner—for they were fellow Artificial Spirits, beings of paramount eternity albeit born from human hands.

—The girl's name was Beatrice, the kitten's name was Puck.

This was the identity of the siblings, who directed deep affection mutually toward each other despite completely unalike shape and form.

Puck: "I must say, Betty sure has a zeal for studying. Reading in the library again, are you?"

Glancing at the book Beatrice was carrying by her chest, Puck tilted his neck whilst gently brushing his whiskers. Subject to his gaze, Beatrice nodded in assent with a "Yes, in fact",

Beatrice: "In order to gain knowledge befitting of what Mother's daughter should suitably have, Betty is diligently devoting herself to studies."

Puck: "Woah, very fine. But is it really needed? Though both Betty and I are Spirits born with a bunch of procedures omitted, mana's usage is something instinctive, right?"

Articulating, Puck raised both of his tiny hands and ahead of his physical body generated a red and a blue light.

Each of the lights were conceived with fire and water mana respectively but for Puck, who happened to be a Great Spirit, this was as natural an ability as swaying his tail.

Of course, Beatrice was capable of the same as well.

Though she was capable…

Beatrice: "Doing it per sensation and augmenting it with proper knowledge is different, in fact, Bubby. You and Betty are capable of it. But, that alone won't suffice, I suppose."

Puck: "Well well, you sure are a stern one, Betty. But why?"

Beatrice: "Betty being Mother's daughter, and presently acting as proxy for the proprietor of this palace of knowledge are also factors that play into it, in fact."

Stretching her dorsal muscles firmly, Beatrice inlaid strength into her chest with which she was carrying the book.

A mountain of books submerged in countless bookshelves, contained therein a vast expanse of knowledge yearning to yet unable to change the world. Suitable of being named as proscribed knowledge forbidden from being hauled outside by anyone.

The true proprietor of this palace, Beatrice's mother was even capable of memorizing it all.

However, Beatrice did not possess that extent of ability yet. But now that she had been entrusted in place of her mother, she must compensate with everything within the grasp of her effort.

Beatrice: "For that, Betty is studying every day, I suppose."

Puck: "Hmm, how praiseworthy… though, it must be tough. I mean, the title of that book is also Mana I, right? The other book is also…"

Articulating so, Puck pulled out a random book out of the bookshelf. With mana concentrating on it, appeared on its front cover the title Earth IV, truly simple and concise.

The book likely had information about earth written within, and had no further information included. That was a problem not present in this book alone, but shared amongst almost all of the magical books submerging the bookshelves.

Puck: "It's her bad habit. From the onset, she must be thinking only about reading and writing it herself, hence that it'd be fine as long as she alone understands it. The way the books have been arranged is a total mess as well."

Beatrice: "M-Mother has her profound intents, in fact, Bubby! It'd be impolite to speak that way, I suppose. Even if it's Bubby, Betty will get furious, in fact."

Puck: "Hmm, you definitely are praiseworthy."

Puck crossed his short arms watching Beatrice pout. Her cheek pressed by his long tail, Beatrice lowered her eyebrows as her pouting cheeks deflated.

Whatever she may have told Puck, Beatrice was greatly perplexed by the abstruse nature of the reading material as well.

Just as Puck had remarked, the proprietor of this palace was the proprietor of genius beyond the attainability of human intellect, and was moving per a peculiar principle that could never be comprehended by others.

The books' arrangement was in identical state, making even Beatrice face hardship in finding the book of her choice.

Truth be told, Mana I which she was holding at present was not the book of her desire either. Though it seemed interesting by itself and she wished to memorize its content via sedulous reading.

Puck: "Some books have the same title at times, the numbering is all slipshod too, yeah. There's also the writing of memos on the back, procrastinating summarizing them altogether, keeping organizing them for another day."

Beatrice: "Betty wants to hurry up, and become such that she can apprehend Mother's ideas as well, I suppose…"

Puck: "I just think it's simply sloppy."

Beatrice: "Bubby!"

As Beatrice pouted her lips, the kitten spoke "Got it got it" and proceeded to levitate further upward. Then suddenly, Puck said "What's this?" as his black eyes darted towards the room's window.

Puck: "Betty, seems like a visitor is here. Pretty brave of him, to make his way to this mansion."

Beatrice: "—! Oh no, in fact! Must prepare for the reception, I suppose!"

Jumping next to Puck as he gazed outside, she affirmed movement of the main gate of Beatrice’s palace.

The shadow, passing through the main gate whilst bewildered, was one with the qualification, having surmounted the multiple barriers for reaching this palace—at present during her mother’s absence, it was Beatrice’s duty to welcome them.

Beatrice: “Bubby! Betty is going to go, in fact! The conversation resumes sometime later, I suppose!”

Puck: “Whoopsie.”

Cramming the book she was holding into a bookshelf within her reach, Beatrice’s dress fluttered as she broke into a sprint. Giving a sendoff to the acutely panicking back, Puck proceeded to caress his whiskers.

Puck: “It sure feels like she takes right after her mother when it comes to this casually unorganized nature.”

Having rushed out of the library leaving these impressions of Puck’s behind, Beatrice headed towards the entry hall. Subsequently reaching the position immediately before, she adjusted her dress and hair, perfecting her personal appearance.

Beatrice: “Well then, about time, this is Betty’s duty, I suppose.”

She told herself before stretching her hand ahead.

Receiving her actions, the palace’s entrance—the dual grand doors automatically opened gradually.

Cold wind conceived with the aroma of a clear sky wafted in. Accompanying the wind and sun rays descending from zenith, the red haired youth peeked into the palace through his astonishment.

Seeing his pupils frozen over in awe and nervousness, Beatrice contently straitened her eyes,

Beatrice: “Commendation for making thy way here. —In Mother’s stead, thy visit shall be welcomed, hero, I suppose.”

Focusing on the opponent owning an astonished expression, with ample dignity—at the very least, seeking to appear with ample dignity by her perspective, Beatrice declared calmly.

—The hero who had paid a call to the Palace of the Witch, was far too exceedingly thrilled by this reception to even swallow his breath.

3

In this world existed beings having conceived special strength, regardless congenital or acquired.

All of them manifested odd talents improbable of being recreated by ordinary individuals, superhumans who interfered with the principles of this world. Even amongst them, the existences who possessed might that projected the brinks of humankind, isolated superior beings that let none other come close—people called those, as the Witches.

Absolute personages who overcame the reason and principles of the human world, unbound by common sense, making no considerations for others. Hence, all feared, dreaded, shunned the Witches.

That was the ordinary state of affairs, and the common cognizance pertaining to the absolute beings named as the Witches.

Beatrice: "—However, Mother is the solitary exception to that, in fact."

Taking pride as though a matter of her own, Beatrice put her hand on her puffed slim chest.

Beatrice: "Mother possesses a profoundly compassionate, magnanimous and honorable heart, I suppose. Hence, whilst wielding the most excelling power in this world, she is not troubled by actuating it for the benefit of others, in fact. You all are also to firmly engrave that in your minds, I suppose."

???: "Haah, haa~h…"

Beatrice: “Engrave that in your mind, in fact?”

???: “U-Understood! I’ll engrave it in my mind, I’ll engrave it in my mind!”

The deferential youth’s shoulders bounced upon her pressurizing gaze. His grateful conduct made Beatrice nod, satisfied.

This place was the palace’s parlor, where visitors received at the entry hall were shown around and made to have a seat.

Above all, the conduct of the visitor seated on the sofa lacked all composure. That was per natural, remaining calm when taken into the Palace of the Witch would be the abnormality.

Seeing fright toward that Witch personified was pleasant to Beatrice.

Beatrice: “It is correct to regard the name of the great Mother as exalted and noble, I suppose.”

???: “That is, a matter of course. After all, the Witch of Wisdom-sama’s name is renowned…”

Beatrice: “Yes! Yes, in fact! You certainly get it, I suppose. Will compliment you for that, in fact.”

Hearing greater admiration for her mother, Beatrice caressed the person’s head as her mood progressively became genial. The youth rounded his eyes upon her actions, as she peered into his blue eyes,

Beatrice: “So? Having reached the great Mother’s… the Witch of Wisdom’s palace, what is that you want to ask, I suppose. What compelled you to approach the barriers of the Witch, in fact.”

???: “Barrier you say, that’s…”

Beatrice: “An exaggeration, you mean to say? To make it clear, this is no place one can just easily come to when he wants, I suppose. A mighty wish that would seemingly scorch your heart, that is what made you reach here, in fact.”

Speaking so, Beatrice pointed towards the exterior of the window—the vast, extensive, entirely uninterrupted landscape. Though this was a remote location distant from human habitation, it was not merely some random remote location.

The summit of a tall, lofty mountain that verbatim pierced above the clouds. The ground underneath, impossible to be viewed due to the obstruction of the thick clouds, was populated by a dense, vast forest, and rich mana that could not be compared with any other land made nature grow to abnormal degrees. This derailed sense of direction, the forest at times freely altered its shape and form, a naturally strategic position which humans were not allowed to enter with ease.

Ahead of this rigorous environment lay this Palace of the Witch.

A resilient body that could travel by foot through the extensive, mighty forest, judgement that could overcome all kinds of obstacles interwoven by nature, a heart that would not get exhausted midway through the course, and, the serendipity of time.

With a concurrence of all of these, the qualification to finally reach this palace could be said to have been acquired.

Beatrice: “However, though it is important to have the mind and body remain strong at once, there is something more important than that, I suppose.”

???: “That being, the wish…?”

Beatrice: “In fact. You must also have an idea, I suppose. Regarding the wish that made you keep advancing, in fact.”

“…”

If a powerful flesh body and sharp determination were the requirements for tackling this forest, then a mighty wish that would seemingly scorch one’s body was precisely the condition for reaching this Witch’s palace, both of these prerequisites had been satisfied.

“…”

The youth, gaze cast downward and searching for words, was only about fifteen to sixteen years old. Age that indubitably constituted him as a young boy, on top of that, rough clothes with a satchel of fur, his old-fashioned tawdry sword and equipment were also meagre.

It could be told from his responses alone that he was abound in knowledge unsuitable for his age, and also possible to sense he was endowed with odd talents and ability rivalling the aforementioned Witches.

For him to have reached the Palace of the Witch meant…

Beatrice: “It means, that you do have a wish unbefitting your stature, I suppose. Mother, welcomes those relying on the Witch for fulfilling such wishes unsuited to their vessel, in fact.”

???: “B-But, I have nothing that could be an offering…”

Beatrice: “—Do not belittle, I suppose. To begin with, Mother’s deeds are not so cheap that they could be recompensed by you all, in fact.”

???: “I-If that’s the case, then that’s all the more reason not to…!”

The youth’s face reddened upon slight provocation.

Beatrice narrowed her eyes upon the befitting immaturity of the youth and took a short inhale. Mocking banal humans this way was fine, but it was about time she fulfilled her original duty.

Acting as proxy for the proprietor of the palace—that being, extending a hand of salvation to those who had stepped foot here in pursuit of wisdom.

Beatrice: “That is Mother’s—the Witch Echidna’s compassion, I suppose.”

???: “—Ah.”

Beatrice: “You shall be asked again, in fact. What is your wish? What do you desire to know? How will you respond, I suppose.

There is nothing which Mother does not know until the very edge of the edge of the edge of this world, in fact.”

Spreading her arms wide declared Beatrice, as if singing.

The youth unwittingly straightened his spine upon hearing her, and similarly Beatrice encouraged herself to an identical degree. Her mother presently absent, Beatrice stood as her proxy, thus it was only natural that her conduct be similar to that of her mother as well.

No failure, error, blunder should happen. —For certain.

The youth’s lips quivered a few times before Beatrice, who had abandoned her own nature, before long he solidified his cheeks as though having cemented his thoughts, and spoke.

???: “Please, teach me… a way my childhood friend, won’t be taken away!”

Beatrice: “—. ——. —Huh?”

Yes, Beatrice was taken aback, dumbfounded, as the youth declared with an expression exhibiting preparedness for death.

Viewing Beatrice’s expression, the youth pitched forward pronouncing “Like I sai~d”,

???: “I want you to teach me. A way that my childhood friend, won’t get snatched away!”

Beatrice: “W-Wait a second, I suppose. Betty may have misheard, in fact. You just said, a way your childhood friend won’t get snatched away…”

???: “Yes! I want to protect my childhood friend, Remina!”

“…”

The youth leaned forward moreover with an intimidating attitude before Beatrice started feeling dizzy.

To rescue lands with crops failed due to droughts, to aid villages fallen into the predicament of frequent floods, to decontaminate grounds that stopped being approached by people due to dense mana storms, for solving such circumstances beyond human intellect the Witch had been relied on.

To think the youth would use this opportunity for his childhood friend, an apparent subject of his affection, to not be snatched away.

Beatrice: “Th-This is, Betty’s first task as Mother’s proxy…”

???: “Um, so on that note, where might the pivotal Witch-sama be?”

The youth timidly asked before Beatrice awakened from her dizziness due to the unforeseen circumstance. However, with a “Wait, I suppose” Beatrice pointed her hand towards the youth,

Beatrice: “Mother is currently absent. Thus, Betty will entertain you and grant the wisdom corresponding to your wish… your, wish…”

???: “Wh-What might have happened?”

Beatrice: “B-Betty didn’t exactly devotedly read through Mother’s vast collection of books, for the sake of some human’s love affair, I suppose…”

Knelt down, Beatrice cursed the misfortune befallen upon herself.

However, Beatrice was representing her mother, the youth before her eyes had stepped foot into this place having overcome the necessary trials. Hence, Beatrice must answer.

Even if this was some boundlessly worthless matter of some human’s love affair…

???: “Now now, Betty, you mustn’t jump to conclusions. It is an important matter for this child, and you must properly listen to what more he has to say, you know.”

Beatrice: “Ah…”

Beatrice subsequently lifted her face at the voice descending from overhead whilst she mourned for her own self.

Present there was Puck, his tail in his arms, softly sprawling in the air levitating close to the ceiling of the parlor. This entrance of Puck's made the youth holler "Eh?!" as he darted his eyes around.

???: "A c-cat… no, could it be, a Spirit?!"

Puck: "Yep yep, I'm surprised you got it. Despite being so furry, I'm a Spirit. With the permission of that Mother, I'm living together with Betty. Nice to be with you~."

???: "P-Pleased to be in your company…?"

Puck pointed his tiny hand towards the baffled youth whilst gyrating and descending. Perplexed, the youth exchanged something akin to handshake by picking Puck's hand with a finger.

Puck: "I'll ask in place of the depressed Betty, but what's your name?"

Toska: "Ah… I'm, Toska. I came from a village called Carnattse."

Puck: "I see I see. I'll say this, you sure are a hard worker, Toska. Betty also spoke of the same, but this palace really is no place you can easily reach. It takes many days if you travel by foot, yeah?"

Toska: "I, was anyhow just desperate…"

Puck: "Seems so. Um, Remina-chan, was it? Is she someone precious to you?"

Puck's enquiry made the youth—Toska falter a bit, but he then proceeded to give a deep nod.

Toska: "Yes… Remina is my childhood friend, but, that's not all."

Puck: "Is that so is that so. If that's the case then I'm rooting for you. I'm an ally to maidens in love and youthful youngsters, you see. So then, what kind of a guy is your romantic rival? Like the spoiled son of a distinguished figure in the village, a greedy nobleman who's the tax collector, or if things are odd then there's also the possibility of it being a relative…"

Beatrice: "…If a love affair is all that it is, then just run away at night or elope with her or whatever, in fact."

The deeply breathing Beatrice threw water onto Puck and Toska's heated dialogue.

Though she had surmounted the initial shock, Beatrice could not digest this with ease in spite of even Puck's direction. The love affair of a man and a woman was far too lowly to borrow the knowledge of the Witch of Wisdom.

Beatrice: "Yet, why did he make it to the palace, I suppose… the criterion for selection is excessively enigmatic, in fact. Betty laments her insufficiency of being unable to apprehend Mother's profound intents, I suppose…!"

Holding her head, Beatrice earnestly surmised the true motives of her currently absent mother.

She must understand the intentions of her mother, voiced not in many words, lest she fail to fulfill her duty of being her proxy. Wrinkles forming by her lovable eyebrows, Beatrice groaned.

Witnessing Beatrice's conduct, Toska stood up, having surpassed the limit of his endurance.

Toska: "Um! There really is no time! At this rate Remina will… Remina will, become a sacrifice for the Blight Dragon!"

Beatrice: "—Wait again, in fact."

Beatrice pointed her palm towards his muzzle as Toska earnestly implored. The exchange made Toska widen his eyes, vocalizing a "Hm?", but Beatrice paid no heed.

If anything, she commandingly glared at the youth taller than herself.

Beatrice: "Blight Dragon? Did you say Blight Dragon, I suppose?

Your childhood friend was chosen as sacrifice for the Blight Dragon, in fact?”

Toska: “Th-That’s correct! I’ve been saying that the whole time, haven’t I!”

Beatrice: “You didn’t say even the slightest bit of that, you enormous dunce!”

Toska: “O~w ~hk?!”

His tiptoes stomped, Toska jumped up and down with tearful eyes. However, considering how he had distressed Beatrice due to his dearth of explanation, he had earned that much.

He must have also had anxiety and nervousness after having reached the Palace of the Witch. She had considered that, but what a truly crude elucidation it had been. However, now she had a grasp on the matter.

Puck: “In other words, a Blight Dragon settled close to Toska’s village, and Toska’s childhood friend…”

Toska: “It’s Remina.”

Puck: “Right, Remina was chosen as the sacrifice is what the situation is. So, you can’t run away with Remina and let the village be brought to ruin by the Blight Dragon either, and are facing immense turmoil, is what it means.”

Toska powerlessly nodded as Puck encapsulated the circumstance. He hesitantly commenced reciting the situation surrounding himself, his childhood friend, and the village.

Toska: “Carnattse, is a small village with a population of about fifty people. Most households practice farming, including mine, and I am the second son… Remina, is the same age as me and she’s also my neighbor.”

Beatrice: “Get this backstory of yours out of here, in fact.”

Toska: “Y-Yes… um, anyhow, Remina says she’s going to become the sacrifice for the Blight Dragon for the sake of the village and just won't listen. But, even if Remina were to become the sacrifice…"

Puck: "Once it has an empty stomach again it'll demand the same thing. Dragons sure are classless."

Hearing Puck's impression gave no rise to a smile on Toska's face.

His childhood friend who accepted the role of being the sacrifice was a valorous young girl, but Puck's say was correct. Even if the sacrifice were to be offered, only a smidgen of peace would the Blight Dragon grant.

And, Toska did not want to lose his childhood friend in exchange for that smidgen of peace.

Beatrice: "So, you came here searching for a way to kill the Blight Dragon, I suppose."

Toska: "N-No! I wouldn't go that far…"

Beatrice: "Unnecessary appearances are a waste of time, in fact. Coming so far for the sake of hope, then dreading your wish at the crucial point, I suppose? That is unhinged, in fact."

"…"

She affirmed precisely his wish, his desire.

To frantically cling to something, to wish whilst paying no heed to appearances, meant having reached the water's edge. When there no longer existed any future, hope, potentiality, only to those who could earnestly put their life on the line did the gates of the Palace of the Witch open.

And Beatrice was one acting as proxy for the Witch who offered her hand to those drowning.

Beatrice: "Now, the Great Spirit Beatrice enquires, I suppose. What is your wish? Having arrived at the Palace of the Witch who grants wisdom, just what is it that you desire, in fact."

Toska: “I…”

In response to Beatrice’s question, Toska’s voice became huskier, tinged with heat.

Nervousness parched the youth’s mouth, but he prevailed over that vexing thirst. The youth bit his lips, saturating his tongue with his own blood, his blue eyes gazing at Beatrice,

Toska: “…I want to kill the Blight Dragon, and save Remina.”

Beatrice: “Can’t hear you, I suppose.”

Toska: “—Teach me a way to kill the Blight Dragon! Remina, is someone precious to me!”

Blood streaming from the vicinity of his mouth, Toska powerfully beseeched with impetus as though truly vomiting blood.

Listening to Toska implore, Puck shut a single eye whilst hugging his tail. And Beatrice nodded, having heard the same implore,

Beatrice: “The Witch’s daughter, Beatrice, shall grant that wish of yours, in fact.”

She answered, with a smile she had done her best effort to learn from her mother.

4

Puck: “Nevertheless, so the opponent is a Blight Dragon eh~. A bit weighty for Betty’s first task.”

Their discussion straightened out, Puck gently broke the ice as he leisurely descended.

Vocalizing a “Huh” Toska made a startled expression at the innocuous comment. As though awakening from a fever, he compared Beatrice and Puck with the eye,

Toska: “That reminds me, I got a bit carried away but… what’s this about the Witch-sama being absent, or the Witch’s daughter, or a cat Spirit-sama?!”

Beatrice: “…No need to make such a ruckus, I suppose. It’s just as you heard, in fact. Bubby is a Spirit, and Betty is Mother’s daughter. And Mother, the proprietor of the palace, is absent, I suppose. Something about there being an unusual evil omen, she is currently on a trip to the eastern edge, in fact.”

Toska: “She’s gone out you say… wh-when will she be able to return?!”

Beatrice: “No specific clue, I suppose. She simply comes to observe the circumstances once a month, in fact. Generally, it’s usually the night of the full moon.”

Toska: “—~hk, we won’t make it then!”

Toska hollered, countenance pale and hands on his head.

Toska: “Remina will be proffered as sacrifice on the night of the full moon… only ten days remain till then!”

Puck: “Hmm hmm, exactly the X-Day Echidna returns on, huh.”

Toska: “Ekks…? Anyhow, we must return to the village before that day!”

Toska peered at Beatrice as though clinging onto her, his face yet pallid.

His gaze was urging her to somehow get in contact with Echidna, but there existed no such means. The tool Echidna had invented, the Conversing Mirrors were there, but she did not carry those with herself.

According to her mother, she was not one who liked to look at her own face…

Beatrice: “It would be far too late should Mother’s return be awaited, in fact. Even for granting a plan instead, it would be onerous to complete preparations within ten days from now, I suppose.”

Puck: “Even if their hands are grabbed as they drown, there’s no way everybody would be saved, isn’t it~.”

Toska: “No way…”

Hearing Beatrice and Puck’s conversation, Toska’s head hung low, heartbroken.

Truly ironic. For him to have made his way to the Palace of the Witch seeking a hand of salvation, yet for it to remain ungranted due to the pivotal Witch’s absence. The outcome, he wasted the remaining few fragments of time he had with his childhood friend and must return empty-handed owning no other alternatives.

Rather, there was no surety whether he would even be able to make it back to that village by the next night of the full moon.

Beatrice: “…That is, unacceptable, in fact.”

Puck: “Betty?”

Puck’s ears quivered at her murmur. Looking upwards at Puck, the characteristic patterns visible on Beatrice’s pupils flailed.

Beatrice: “Just as Bubby is aware, this is Betty’s first task, I suppose. Mother entrusted Betty to attend during her absence, and commanded to fulfill the duties of the Palace of the Witch, in fact. Yet, to abandon the first hero who called onto this place due to an absence of means, are you fine with something like that, I suppose.”

Puck: “Hmm, admitting not being able to do what can’t be done is also a show of courage, wouldn’t you say.”

Beatrice: “But, it is Betty’s mission to be useful to Mother, in fact.”

Puck: “—Mission.”

Puck grimaced at Beatrice’s words as she firmly clenched her fist and touched her chest.

The word mission was a heavy one for Spirits—Artificial Spirits, Beatrice and Puck. So incredibly heavy it was beyond any possible comparison, constituting the core of their selves.

Both had taken birth together, not naturally, but by the Witch, and their existences held purpose.

Beatrice's did, so did Puck's. That was…

Beatrice: "As long as Betty is serving as Mother's proxy, no hands seeking salvation shall be shaken off, I suppose."

Toska: "Beatrice-chan…"

Beatrice: "Why would you suffix -chan onto Betty's name there, in fact!"

Toska: "That hu~rt ~hk?!"

Toska was moved to see Beatrice be so ardent, only for her to downright step on his feet.

However, she believed this exuberance made for the undone final push.

—The Blight Dragon extermination of Carnattse, as sought by the hero Toska.

Beatrice: "Mineself Beatrice, shall grant that wish in Mother's stead, I suppose!"

"…"

Beatrice declared sonorously whilst vigorously beating her chest.

His eyes widened upon her pronouncement, Toska inhaled with the trodden foot grasped in his hands.

Toska: "Um, I do appreciate the sentimentaagh?!"

Beatrice: "Got tired of listening to your unneeded objections, in fact."

With the toes of his other foot stepped on, Toska hopped on the floor with one leg at a time.

For Toska—no, for outsiders to make light of Beatrice assuming from her outward appearance was as anticipated. However, that was immense imprudence.

Beatrice: “Betty is Mother’s daughter… being lumped together with some random lackluster Spirit is intolerable, I suppose. Besides, if Betty will go then Bubby will also come along without fail, in fact.”

Puck: “Well, that’s true. I’ve been told to look after Betty by Echidna anyways, and there’s only so far you can actually let your cute kid travel into the world.”

Toska: “Puck-sama aside, Beatrice-cha… -sama, is also a Spirit?”

Tending to both of his feet whilst seated on the chair, Toska tilted his head as he visually compared Beatrice and Puck.

Toska: “I completely thought Spirits were like, either softly floating around like lights, or otherwise had taken the form of animals like Puck-sama…”

Puck: “Hm, that’s correct. Though on instances there are also some who specialize in taking the forms of humans, a great deal of Spirits’ original forms are animal-esque forms. Same goes for me, too.”

Beatrice: “For Betty, it is simply that this is the form Mother brought forth, I suppose. Of course, a Spirit’s might is not determined by shape and form, in fact. Even Bubby is so furry and lovable, I suppose.”

Puck: “Ehehe.”

Toska: “Well… I don’t really know about that, but…”

The Spirit siblings held their heads high side by side, before Toska pronounced “Ah” and formed an expression of having noticed something.

Toska: “Spirits live far longer than humans, yes? Then could it be that the same applies to the two of you?”

Beatrice: “O-Of course, in fact. It would be trouble should you misinterpret this brimming majesty and intellect, I suppose.”

Toska: “I knew it! Um, may I ask what approximately your age is?”

Puck: “Both Betty and I would be around three years old, yeah.”

Toska: “You’re totally young!”

Toska exclaimed, his anticipation proven inaccurate, as Puck shrugged his shoulders. Levitating before the let down Toska’s face, Puck pointed his tail forward and remarked “Do you hear me?”,

Puck: “Don’t have any misunderstandings, okay. A cat’s three years, equate to around a human’s thirty years.”

Toska: “But still, that’s way younger than my old man, and going by that line of reason Beatrice-sama is… woops!”

Beatrice: “Mgh, don’t conveniently dodge, in fact.”

Toska: “I absolutely will dodge!”

Toska evaded Beatrice’s heel, revealing his intent to not be stepped on countlessly. He then proceeded to gaze at the two, commenting “It’s no good after all”,

Toska: “I appreciate your sentiment. But, I cannot entangle children… people who are younger than me, into something so perilous. I, will run back to the village…”

Beatrice: “You do not appear to be a fellow so laudable that you would then spend the remainder of your time together, I suppose. You intend to challenge the Blight Dragon for the sake of your childhood friend, in fact.”

Toska: “—~hk.”

Beatrice: “What an inconceivably colossal fool, I suppose. Something like tackling a battle that cannot be won is meaningless, in fact.”

His eyes cast down, Toska sunk his teeth into his lips upon Beatrice's discernment, unable to rebut. For she had hit the bull's eye.

For the sake of his childhood friend, he had endangered his life to pay a call to this palace, banking his dependency onto the Witch of Wisdom. Inversely said, it implied the absence of any allies who would fight with him.

Beatrice: "Now that you have come here, something like that won't be allowed, I suppose. The Witch of Wisdom grants wisdom, in order to elevate those seeking salvation. Then, what can be accorded is not restricted to wisdom, in fact."

Toska: "—Ah."

Beatrice: "It shall be said once more. You seek a way to kill the Blight Dragon. And, Betty gave her word to respond to that. Thus, she shall respond. —Betty will, with this life of her's at stake."

For might to dwell in her words, in these moments, set ablaze was a definite flame within Beatrice's soul.

And that flame transfigured into an inferno, engulfing even Toska, gazing before her, within. Scorched by the blaze, Toska inhaled and deeply lowered his head as light sojourned within his blue eyes.

Toska: "Thank you very much. Prithee, fight by my side."

No disputation necessary this time. —Marking the beginning, of her first task.

5

Fastening the doors of the palace and arranging a parting letter for the time her mother returned during their absence, Beatrice, alongside Puck, exited the palace accompanying Toska with all preparations completed.

Beatrice: "The target time is the night of the full moon ten days from now… Betty will make sure to reach, I suppose."

Toska: “To be honest, I believe we will barely make it. Since the climb up to this palace was nothing short of extraordinary.”

Many set forth for the Palace of the Witch in pursuit of wisdom. But, the vast majority of them were filtered out due to scanty courage and ability. The prime reason being the mountain trail leading towards the palace.

So bedeviling it could no longer even be dubbed a mountain trail, cold sweat emerged on Toska through mere recollection.

However…

Beatrice: “Relax, in fact. The hindering vermin up until the palace are only there when entering… they won’t intrude when returning.”

Toska: “Really?! But, there’s also the rumor about the forest of no return…”

Puck: “Those kinds of rumors have been spread because if you come to the forest with scrappy feelings and ability, then you’ll only have a bad time, I think? Echidna’s a girl who does those sorts of things.”

Toska’s cognizance seemed to be enormously jolted by the impact of the truth he had been informed about.

And, seeing a rise in the number of humans conversant with her mother’s true form was something delightful yet slightly lonesome for Beatrice.

Beatrice: “Regardless, there is no apprehension for descending the mountain, in fact.”

Toska: “Yes. If we can just exit the mountain and the forest, then I’ll run while carrying Beatrice-sama on my shoulder the rest of the way. Puck-sama will…”

Puck: “I can keep up by flying so it’s all good~.”

Toska nodded as Puck responded with a relaxed pitch, waving his tail. Putting the two’s discourse aside, Beatrice looked back towards the palace and gently tapered her eyes whilst standing before the gates.

A parental home for Beatrice, forbye the palace of wisdom entrusted to her by her mother—albeit momentarily, something stood out about being apart from it.

Toska: “Beatrice-sama, is it truly alright to be absent from the palace?”

Puck: “Well, only one or two people make their way to it in a year, and if they happen to reach it during the time of absence then they’re just unlucky I suppose so it can’t be helped, I guess. This is also the first time Betty is leaving her home, so let’s let her resolve her heart.”

Toska: “Huh, it’s also the first time she’s leaving the palace?”

Puck: “Is it something to be surprised about?”

Puck caressed his own face with a hand before Toska opened his eyes wide,

Puck: “Even animals live their entire lives within their territories if they can defend it, right? If there never rises a need to go afar, then you too would live all your life inside that tiny village of yours. It’s the same thing.”

Toska: “If you say so, that’s true… I suppose?”

Puck: “Betty’s thing is also important, but I think you’d be better off worrying for yourself. There probably won’t be any time to take breaks between this place and your village, so are you fine with the way you’re prepared?”

In accordance with Beatrice’s assessment of it being meagre, judging Toska’s equipment to vastly fall short of the minimum necessary standard would be correct.

Despite being congruous with him being a son of a farmer, it would inescapably be termed as unsuitable for a wayfarer undertaking long travels. His garbs, his footwear, even the sword hanging on his hip, all were paltry and of poor quality.

Puck: “This is coming a bit too late, but I’m surprised you made your way to the palace. It can only be categorized as love and courage making up for it, isn’t it?”

Toska: “But, only as compensation… also, my body’s been burlier than others’ since long before, so that may be the reason.”

Puck: “Burly… that sort of a Divine Protection, I wonder? Well, it’s gotta be at least that much or it’d be impossible, yeah.”

Toska answered whilst scratching his head as Puck made sense of it, surmising it to be something in such wise.

And, making end of her brief farewell to her parental home, Beatrice regrouped with the two.

Beatrice: “Sorry for the wait, I suppose. It’s time to depart, in fact.”

Toska: “Understood… Beatrice-sama, your luggage?”

Even Toska, who sported lightweight equipment and clothing for tackling the towering mountain, was stupefied by Beatrice’s travel outfit.

For nothing about it had altered since the time they had their dialogue in the parlor.

Beatrice: “Betty is certain to have told you, I suppose. Betty is a Spirit… this outfit and even physique are molded with mana, in fact. Betty has total freedom over changing clothes and refashioning… hand luggage is a mere hindrance, I suppose.”

Toska: “Then, what about water or food?”

Puck: “Mhm, unnecessary for us. We’ll take ‘em if you give ‘em, but simply gobbling up the mana suspended in the air is sufficient. That’s why, I’m also empty-handed, and naked.”

Beatrice: “Bubby has natural fur, which is just the best, in fact.”

Beatrice light-heartedly nodded as she rubbed cheeks with Puck who perched on her shoulder. Hearing this interchange made Toska say “Is that so~” in admiration,

Toska: “If that’s the case then I, a human, am looking to be the most burdensome…”

Beatrice: “Hmph. Now that Betty has decided to follow through with it, it is her duty to pull you along, I suppose. Through the course of the journey she will provide you with water, and even help with hunting if necessary, in fact.”

Puck: “We can also give rise to a tailwind, and level the ground to make it easier to run. More than satisfactory, wouldn’t you say?”

Wind blew with a swing of Beatrice’s hand, ground was smoothed with a swing of Puck’s tail. Beholding this with his own two eyes, Toska cleared his throat and was yet again allured by the two’s might as Spirits.

Furthermore, he learnt that acting with queer restraint pertaining to the two’s might would be discourteous, as well.

Toska: “—. I understand. I shall borrow the power of you two! Prithee, make haste toward the itinerary to the village first!”

Beatrice: “Agreeable, I suppose. Now, well then, you’ll have to carry Betty in your arms, in fact.”

Nodding with a “Yes!”, Toska’s hands reached for Beatrice, both her arms outstretched. And, he scooped her up and coiled his arm around Beatrice’s waist, carrying her by his side as though carrying firewood.

Toska: “Alright… agh, it hurt ~hk?!”

Beatrice: “Don’t go alright-ing, I suppose! What, in fact, is th-this humiliating way of carrying!”

Toska shrieked with tearful eyes, with his armpit pinched by Beatrice whom he was carrying.

Truly, just what did he regard the exalted Spirit as. Toska’s conduct lacked the natural forethought towards even a lady, prior to Beatrice's honor.

Beatrice: "A peasant after all, I suppose. Wield more delicacy, the daintiness of carrying a baby, in fact."

Toska: "A baby… I-I understand. Al, right."

Beatrice: "…Hm, no problems, I suppose."

This time gently carried in his arms like a child, Beatrice pardoned Toska's insolence. Puck threw himself down on Beatrice's chest, and the standard stance of the three departing on the journey was now contrived.

Toska: "Alright then, I shall run straight ahead. Please let me know if there is ever any issue."

Beatrice: "Well, you can keep running without care, I suppose. This side will handle the earth flattening, I suppose."

Toska: "Understood. Well then…"

Firm strength pouring into his legs, Toska then broke into a sprint, Beatrice still in his arms. Her entire frame basking in the acceleration and wind, Beatrice left the Palace of the Witch for the first time.

As the palace slowly, steadily faded away into the distance, she attempted to look back onto it in a final display of longing and valediction…

Beatrice: "—Wh-Wha?!"

Toska bolted at a velocity infinitely greater, the palace had already become invisible in a matter of seconds as the forms of the three raced down the hilly road and vaulted into the dense clouds.

Within the clouds, with no longer present the white titans of ice that functioned as impeding obstacles in the paths of those with their sights set on the palace, as if verbatim flying over the bare rock that made for an unfavorable foothold, Toska hurtled downward.

Beatrice sensed no room for the assistance of magic in his unwavering momentum and speed.

Truly, momentum akin to a gale.

Toska: “No hindrances when returning…! Seems like that was true!”

Beatrice: “Ababa, ababa, ubababa…”

Toska: “If this is how things are then it looks like we’ll be able to descend the mountain in half a day. We’ll make it, I’ll make it, Remina!”

Toska, exhilarated, shan’t notice the grueling condition Beatrice was in, within his arms. On Beatrice’s chest, Puck caressed his whiskers whilst pronouncing an “Ah~”, being rocked similar to her.

Puck: “I did think it was weird since he managed to climb up the mountain, but this kid also wasn’t normal after all, huh.”

So he whispered, his expression utterly drained.

6

—Blight Dragon, was nothing but a convenient name for Dragons harboring enmity toward humans.

Identical to how the Spirits that yielded harm onto others were labelled as Blight Spirits. However, unlike Spirits who for the most part did not leave their birthplaces, Dragons sought to expand their turf by their own accord.

This resulted in the birth of their conflict with people who originally lived there, subsequently starting to be designated as Blight Dragons.

Beatrice: “In other words, Dragons being regarded as Blight Dragons is solely a matter of humans’ point of view, in fact.”

Toska: “I see… then, the Dragon who showed up on a mountain close to the village is also.”

Beatrice: “It means it is one who literally spread its wings wide in order to expand its turf, I suppose.”

Puck: “In these times even the Dragons are all worked up due to their population having risen too much~. They’re likely troubled themselves, seeing the places they could use as dwellings become smaller and smaller.”

The time was one of total darkness, Beatrice elucidated about Dragons whilst hewing the campfire.

Half a day since their departure from the Palace of the Witch, Toska’s swordsmanship had exemplarily exited the montane forest and they had successfully escaped the mountain as well as the forest of the Witch. Nothing existed for Beatrice to draw a comparison with, but by Puck’s word his accomplishment was akin to monstrous.

Toska: “Monstrous you say, that is an overappraisal.”

Puck caressed his whiskers as Toska presented a humble response to the evaluation. What his round, black eyes glanced at was not the modest Toska, but his background.

—Behind Toska, lying on the ground was a titanic, ferocious-looking lion.

Black fur similar to wires, endowed with sharp fangs and claws, the quadruped possessed brutishness kindred with its fiendish appearance but its eyes had already lost their light, the thread of its life severed.

And the one to inexorably bring down this titanic brute was nobody but Toska.

Puck: “I guess it’s a Guiltylowe? Not very intelligent, but their might speaks for itself. And you tidied it up so easily. You know, are you sure you don’t hunt mere Dragons and stuff even without us being there?”

Toska: “Please stop, Puck-sama. You’ll know once you see any actual Dragons… They’re, not like this stupid dog. For my body to tremble non-stop during a confrontation, has happened for the first time ever since with big brother."

Swiveling his sword with an accustomed way of wielding, Toska dissected the titanic brute he had brought down. Peeling its skin, chopping the spouting organs and blood into casual sizes, he held it on the bonfire concocted on thin woods.

Beatrice: "Will other animals not gather due to the scent of grilling meat, in fact?"

Toska: "Please be at ease. This guy surely has the white horn on its forehead. Other animals don't come close to animals with this horn. It also serves as an animal repel if you carry its blood."

Beatrice: "…You seem familiar with this, I suppose."

Beatrice sighed as she gazed at his cooking, upon Toska's display of practical knowledge.

Though in truth, Beatrice's plan had been to flaunt her ability and make Toska sing her praises like "As expected of the daughter of the Witch-sama!" by the time of having reached up to this point.

Beatrice: "Betty's plan failed because you're a monster, in fact."

Toska: "Now you too, Beatrice-sama! Believe me, I am no monster. I can just move my body a very teensy bit more than other people… I do not compare with a Dragon."

A bitter grin, Toska vanished his smile and fixed his pupils onto the flame.

His eyes conveyed a certain longing, that he truly should have been a monster. Had Toska been a monster that could prey even upon a Dragon, then he could have protected his childhood friend without having to depend on anyone.

Toska: "No matter of how many of these stupid dogs I hunt, it is nothing worth taking pride in."

Puck: "That itself makes it a pitiable show for this child who got hunted… Well, it's said they don't have anything in their minds aside from attacking humans, so I guess it's only fair. Seems these types of animals are called Witch Beasts, yeah."

Beatrice: "Witch Beasts… Like Blight Dragons, they're not called Blight Brutes or something, I suppose."

Puck: "Well it is pretty hard to pronounce. Blight Brute. Like beetroot. Blight Brute."

Puck blew a breath onto the grilling meat of the Witch Beast whilst uttering. That instant, the cleaved fat begot an aromatic scent before Toska's belly gave rise to a large grumble.

Toska: "Frankly, their meat doesn't taste good at all."

Puck: "Huh, I see."

Toska: "Because of bad stuff being stockpiled in their bodies or something, the village headman had said. Can't be called anything extravagant either, I'll eat, though."

Articulating so, Toska proceeded to pick up a skewer and heartily dug in. His expression then observably clouded, with a disconsolate look on his face he put down the skewer.

And,

Toska: "Beatrice-sama, would you like one as well?"

Beatrice: "Why, did you think Betty would accept it after seeing your frown just now, in fact…?"

Toska: "No, I just thought there should be more casualties…"

Beatrice: "Just where did you drop your respect for Betty, I suppose?!"

Beatrice nailed her rage onto Toska, who offered her another skewer. A half-joke, Toska obediently drew back the skewer as well.

Puck: "Then, guess I'll take it in Betty's stead. Chomp."

Beatrice: “Bubby?!”

Puck: “Gobble gobble, gobble gobble… mhm, it’s disgusting! One more!”

Toska: “One more you say, managing to eat it alone is a feat.”

Declared Puck with a frown, having snatched the skewer from Toska’s hand and munched the meat. Considering how small his bites were, fully eating one skewer worth of grilled meat alone was an immense task for Puck.

Laughing at Puck’s conduct, Toska gorged on whatever remained of the first skewer.

Guiltylowe’s body was large, plenty of edible portions were still left. A number of skewers were being grilled on the flame, and Beatrice’s gaze intermittently glanced toward them.

She was a Spirit so it was improbable for her to become hungry. It was improbable, and yet…

Puck: “Eating a Witch Beast is also a good way to cover for the knowledge you lack, Betty.”

Beatrice: “B-Betty was thinking the same, in fact. No doubt even Mother would not have experienced eating a Witch Beast, I suppose. It is an opportunity to be useful to Mother, in fact.”

Even the studious Echidna surely mustn’t have ensnared herself in this order of bizarre eating.

Her sense of purpose of being useful to her mother, amalgamated with the inquisitiveness for the unknown before her eyes, Beatrice nervously took one of the grilling skewers in her hand.

And, with Toska and Puck’s watchful eye over her, took one bite of earnest heartfelt desire.

Beatrice: “—It’s disgusting, I suppose!”

The instant she took a bite, she felt the noxiousness characteristic of carnivores fill her mouth. Furthermore the meat itself was rigid beyond chewing, and the oozing flesh fluids upon each crunch were bitter like mud.

Truly, flavor akin to chewing sand.

Beatrice: “Taste of hell, in fact… Sh-Shouldn’t have eaten it, I suppose…”

Puck: “On top of that, this thing’s super filled with bad mana, so it’s poison for us. What the village headman from Toska’s place said was correct.”

Beatrice: “Ueh cough! Cough cough, in fact!”

Beatrice spat out what she once had in her mouth in tremendous fluster. Let her be termed as ill-mannered, but she did not possess the courage to swallow poison. And even if she did, that would amount to nothing but foolhardiness.

Beside her, Puck also spat out the flesh into the flame with a cough.

Puck: “That’s how it is, so I don’t really recommend it to you either, Toska? Even if you’re not a Spirit, bad content may start accumulating if you eat too much.”

Toska: “Is, that so? …But, I killed it, so.”

Puck: “Must eat the life you’ve taken, that type of thinking eh? I think that itself is praiseworthy, but don’t you get into pretty rough spots if you apply that to everything? You seem like you could even eat some venomous insects.”

Toska: “Uh… even I, would prefer not to.”

Though an argument quite extreme, it seemed to have sufficient effect on Toska.

Informed of the possibility that his body may get eaten into from within, even Toska lowered the skewer in his grip. However, his eyes yet remorseful, were contemplating the Witch Beast meat cooling down.

Beatrice: “Why are you fussing over that piece of meat, I suppose. To think you would get that hungry, humans need to put some limits on their inexpediency, in fact.”

Toska: “It’s not that I’m hungry… It’s just that, big brother had once earlier said that I’d get stronger if I ate strong creatures, so just out of habit.”

Manifesting a bitter smile, a sigh leaked from Toska as he released the grilled meat into the flames.

Beatrice felt a queer sensation jab her chest, beholding Toska’s expression. The expression of powerfully yearning for something, very much resembling that of pursuit for an unattainable wish.

Puck: “Big brother you say, you have an elder brother? That reminds me, you did say you were the second son, yeah.”

Toska: “Yes. I have an elder brother who is slightly older than me… though he is so strong, you wouldn’t believe he belongs to this world.”

Beatrice: “…Well well, if that isn’t another overstatement, I suppose. If he is so strong, then you should’ve left the Blight Dragon extermination up to your so-called big brother, in fact.”

Toska: “—. Big brother, has gone out of the village, so.”

His words were not the echo of a younger brother lamenting the absence of his dependable elder brother.

Something far more convoluted, like the mud named a long span of time having sedimented in a water well. All one could do in order to draw the water therein was to remove the mud aside and pray for the fortune of the water well having not dried up.

Beatrice: “But, Betty wants none of that dismal nonsense, I suppose.”

Toska: “Beatrice-sama?”

Beatrice: “Don’t be irresolute, in fact, human. No matter how much you lose heart, you cannot become your siblings, I suppose. That is a matter of course, in fact."

Pruning away the ashes on her footwear, Beatrice looked downward towards the mute Toska. Hands on her hips, as though launching a kick into the melancholic youth's back,

Beatrice: "—But still, you will save the village, I suppose."

Toska: "—Ah."

Beatrice: "You didn't give up, searched for what you could do and aimed for the palace. Though Mother is absent, Betty and Bubby have mobilized your wish, in fact."

No miracles befell upon those who undertook no action. No rains blessed upon those who simply looked towards the heavens.

In a world where all simply withered unless one kept moving forward, the will to advance was utmost sacred.

"…"

By the point of this declaration, Beatrice noticed her own heated temper. Toska's gaze at her now rapidly altered into a source of embarrassment.

Beatrice: "A-At any rate, that's how it is, in fact! Must wake up early tomorrow as well, so sleep right away, I suppose! You'll have to run while carrying Betty in your arms tomorrow as well, in fact!"

Beatrice swiftly articulated whilst concealing her embarrassment, cheeks tinged red. She subsequently lied on the ground blanketed by leaf litter, in the rear of the fallen tree being used as substitute for seating.

She was not reluctant to lie on the ground either, for the impurities on her dress were erased each time she shifted positions. Though she was anticipating the disgrace saturating her face red to rob her of her sleep…

Beatrice: "—Nn."

Her insecurity needless, mind and body exhausted by her first travel to afar, Beatrice's consciousness reaped the allurement of deep sleep.

"…"

Beginning to hear her quiet breaths of sleep within a matter of seconds, Toska exchanged a glance with Puck.

Puck: "Looks like she was tired, after all. As you saw, she'd been in pretty high spirits."

Toska: "Looks to be so. Since it was also apparently the first time she left her house… To think she would devote such efforts for my sake, when we've just met."

An intent gaze at the wavering bonfire, Toska put one hand on another and closed his eyes.

All kinds of intricate emotions pirouetted within the depths of his chest. Gratitude towards Beatrice and Puck, longing for the childhood friend he had left behind, love and despise for his elder brother absent from the village during such crucial times, apprehension whether the choice he made was the correct one or not, illimitable and unceasing.

All of them, thorns incessantly tormenting Toska since he had reached the Palace of the Witch, and since they had departed. However…

Toska: "I will save the village…"

Puck: "Hehehe, Betty said so, yeah. I also think it's correct. It was hasty and careless to rely on the Witch for the Blight Dragon extermination, but it was right that you abided by your intuition."

Toska: "Is that, supposed to be a compliment?"

Puck: "Of course."

Puck nodded, though the Spirit's words were every so often mingled with an unknown language.

Though his own illiteracy was distressing, had he truly yet chosen the best out of the attainable options.

Puck: “That is, something Betty and you will prove going forward, isn’t it.”

Astonished by the words as though his innermost heart had been read, Toska then beamed a wry smile.

Putting the lovely young girl over there aside, he could not possibly rival the easygoing, floating kitten over here.

That admission in his mind, Toska picked up one of the skewers that had been grilled to burns. Rather than crisp, the meat had about halfway turned into ash, though the flavor of the raw ingredient may now have vanished instead.

Matters will remain busy tomorrow onwards as well. Regardless however meagerly, he must fill his stomach however much possible, subsequently biting into the burnt meat.

Toska: “—I guess, Witch Beasts aren’t stuff to be eaten after all.”

Grumbling a quibble, Toska chewed the meat stuck onto the bones until the very end.

7

Next day onwards resumed the journey of the three, lasting for shorter than ten days.

Beatrice: “Neither tailwinds nor earth flattening are needed for you, to be honest, you’re disgusting, I suppose.”

Toska: “Isn’t disgusting going a bit too far?!”

Toska hurtled, Beatrice up in his arms, at a velocity enough to receive the reward of such aspersion.

His sprint was so excessively swift that to a bystander Toska’s legs would appear as invisible, and any Witch Beasts or stray dogs that attempted to pounce and halt him were all deserted behind, their opportunity galloping past them.

Puck: “Hmm, not disgusting, but it is uncanny. Could it be that everyone in Toska’s village is a monster like you?”

Toska: “Old man, mum, Remina and the others are all normal! … No, I’m telling you I’m normal as well!”

Beatrice: “Rattles of denial coming from a guy who himself is aware, in fact. Quite loose-lipped, I suppose.”

Toska: “When I’m eating nothing but Witch Beasts, you two have a grim look in your eyes at the time of campfire, so I tried catching fish in the river today…”

A peculiar fish washed by the riverside floundered, as Toska looked at the two whilst basking in the splashes of water.

Beatrice and Puck, identically soaked due to the waves evoked by the peculiar fish, remarked about the gargantuan peculiar fish of a length that all three of them could be lined side by side and its tailfin would still remain revealed.

Puck: “For something that was hunted to be eaten, it’s way too big. Wonder if he doesn’t know how to hold back?”

Beatrice: “To begin with, the repulsiveness of its appearance is identical to that of a Witch Beast, in fact. Despite being a human, does he not know that not just flavor but appearance is also important for meals, I suppose.”

Toska: “I can hear you, the two of you!”

Puck: “Who would’ve thought that fish was the lord of the fishes in the river feared in the nearby village, pretty big coincidence.”

Beatrice: “Not a quantity that could’ve been disposed of, so it was correct to hand it over to the village in fact.”

By having brought down the lord of the nuisance fishes and handing it over, they had been amiably welcomed by the residents of the village. Because those peculiar fishes had become an obstruction in fishing, they had seemingly verged on drying up, allegedly.

They were badgered to sojourn in the village and partake in the banquet to be conducted, but…

Toska: “I also, must save my village, after all.”

Puck: “Hm hm, commendable commendable. But, the one you want to save is moreso your childhood friend than the village, yeah.”

Beatrice: “That village headman implored to give his daughter to you, I suppose. What a waste, in fact.”

Toska: “No matter what you say, Remina is the only one for me!”

—Their journey had been a smooth one, but on occasion perilous circumstances paid a call to them.

“…”

Melded with dusk, the claws of a titanic brute ambushing them from the shadows, Toska skillfully warded them off with the sword he wielded and the rebounding blade beautifully bisected its beefy throat.

Sable blood spouted, the entire body of the red haired youth bathed in it with no shift in expression.

Repugnance, shirking, were luxurious albeit moreso futile and needless sentiments in the midst of battle.

Letting those not perturb his mind, Toska braced his paltry sword forward to the next, free from neglect.

“—Kiyuryursheeah!!”

A ferocious, truculent roar echoed, jolting the parched night of the wasteland was a Witch Beast assimilating shadows.

The Witch Beast that had assailed the troupe on the first night as well, members of the Guiltylowe species—that too, a horde of them.

Perhaps due to negligence of having become accustomed to the journey, they seemed to have inadvertently entered the hunting ground of the horde.

Though Toska too had acted tough and contrasted the opponent with Dragons as nothing but animals.

Toska: “But if they’re large in numbers, then it’s definitely rough…!”

Chased by the opposition against the impertinent continued linkage of Witch Beasts, Toska too felt his composure whittle. Increase of wounds caused by the grazing claws and fangs, the scent of his flowing blood roused the Guiltylowe.

“…”

Beatrice and Puck watched over Toska’s labors from afar.

They had not erased their presences or concealed themselves. The Guiltylowe had simply put the young girl and kitten for later and prioritized opposing the menace before their eyes, Toska.

Conceit conveying that a small, frail creature could be turned into a dish later on as well.

Puck: “To be neglecting us, guess they really aren’t very intelligent after all. Regardless, Toska is putting up a pretty good fight over there… so Betty, what do we do?”

Beatrice: “—. Betty will.”

Puck: “I see. OK, got it.”

Snuggling under Beatrice’s hair, Puck proceeded to emerge following her brief reply.

Puck’s tiny frame then headed above the battleground of whirling blood. By that point the vigilance of the Witch Beasts, who had made light of the Spirits as trifle articles, turned toward him.

They brandished their claws overhead towards Puck, who was easily within their grasp upon a single leap…

Puck: “Such casual mistakes unfortunately aren’t going to get you any gold stars.”

The following instant innumerable stumps of ice stitched the horde of Guiltylowe to the ground.

The Witch Beasts simultaneously bellowed, their limbs and torsos lunged, having been verbatim shot through by the glaciating impact. However, the solatium for erring the enemy’s war potential was a heavy one.

Before long, ice spread from the mouth of the wounds birthed by the icicles, congealing even the throats relinquishing their death wails as the Witch Beasts transmuted into ice.

With this, concluded the battle of tonight as well.

Toska: “Puck-sama…”

Puck: “No need to thank me. I’d been having it pretty easy up until now, after all.”

Toska: “No, if you’re this strong then please provide assistance more quickly…”

The injured Toska gave a wry smile to Puck, blood cascading from his cheeks and forehead. His correct articulation made Puck raise his eyebrows with a “Woops”, whistling away in an attempt to varnish the topic over.

The frosty sculptures of ice afterwards shattered, destroying the Witch Beasts down to their finest.

Puck: “Now then, coming to Toska’s wounds…”

Beatrice: “Ah… Betty will heal them, I suppose. This is nothing, in fact.”

Beatrice secured the duty for herself before Puck commenced his treatment. She zoomed over, hand aloft, and a pale light started healing the wounds Toska bore.

The mild sensation briskly and gently closed up the wounds, Toska sighed in relief as well. And once all of his wounds were closed, he briskly stretched his back.

Toska: “Alright, the pain’s all gone too! Thanks, Beatrice-sama.”

Beatrice: “Your gratitude vaguely seems to lack respect for Betty, I suppose…”

Her expression austere, Beatrice averted her eyes away from Toska and murmured. Beside her, Puck groaned a “Hmm” with a troubled expression whilst viewing the shattered ice sculptures of the Witch Beasts,

Puck: “Feels wei~rd. Self-assertive kids like these don’t often flock together with others.”

Toska: “On top of that, it is strange that we encountered them over here. It’s normal for people to come and go by this path in this area, even if they’re Witch Beasts they never expanded their turfs or anything, yet…”

Beatrice: “…Then, the answer is simple, in fact. They were driven out of their original dwelling, and were in the midst of escaping, I suppose.”

Beatrice’s theory gave rise to a staggered expression on Toska. Seeming to have reached an identical conclusion as Beatrice, Puck nodded with a “Yeah~” whilst caressing his whiskers.

Puck: “If the promised night of the full moon is the limit of the Dragon’s hunger, then it must be starting to get into a bad mood now. That may have agitated the atmosphere, which is why the Witch Beasts are also running away.”

Toska: “…It’s about time, isn’t it.”

Puck, devoid of nervousness, contrary to him was Toska, taut with pressing emotions. Imposing on herself as much nervousness, Beatrice too ascertained what lay ahead of the highway of night.

Exactly nine days since they had departed from the palace—the faintly waned moon of the night sky, would surely fáilte a purely round, spherical full moon void of any impurities tomorrow.

Beatrice: “Somehow made it in time, in fact. —The promised, night of the full moon, I suppose.”

Beatrice muttered, Puck and Toska consented whilst maintaining silence.

—The journey, Beatrice’s first albeit a short one, its end was imminent before their eyes.

Chapter 2:
Night of Stars’ Descent

1

Beatrice: “And so, Betty and Bubby, along with the foolhardy human, reached the end of the journey which lasted shorter than ten days and arrived at the crux, in fact.”

Ryuzu: “I-It certainly is a tremendous adventure…”

Despite only having unwillingly grumbled in the beginning, once she gained the momentum of reciting, words escaped her as though brimming over.

Stirring the hotpot with a spoon whilst listening to this, Ryuzu intermittently revealed the nail-biting tension she felt via facial expressions and utterances, a truly excellent listener.

Thanks to this, Beatrice unwittingly indulged herself in reminiscing as well.

Anyhow, the story now arrived at the critical Dragon extermination, but…

???: “—Now that is a really interesting tale. What happens next?”

Beatrice: “Yuck, I suppose.”

Before she could resume narrating, Beatrice grimaced upon hearing an unpleasant voice. Though the voice came from behind, she need not turn back. For he came around to her beforehand.

???: “Yuck doesn’t make for a greeting, does it. Won’t you allow me to join in on your story?”

Interposing so and inclining his body, the individual somewhere between a youngster and a man, his navy-blue hair stretching long, clad in dodgy devilishness was peering at Beatrice’s visage.

His entrance had Ryuzu smile in Beatrice's stead.

Ryuzu: "Roswaal-sama, are you finished with your business?"

Roswaal: "Yes, it all went quite smoothly. It helps that the people here are all so cooperative. By their aid. It's ought to have made for another step closer toward the realization of Teacher's dearest wish."

Ryuzu: "I am elated to hear so… Beatrice-sama, you mustn't hang your head low."

Eyes clear blue, the grinning youth—Roswaal's entrance impelled Beatrice to scowl further, subsequently giving up on keeping her gaze cast downward for how futile it held.

Beatrice: "Got it, got it I suppose. Defeat accepted, in fact… you, from where had you been eavesdropping, I suppose. So distasteful, in fact."

Roswaal: "Eavesdropping, that's a nasty way to put it. To begin with, it had been decided that we would be having dinner here. If you're to start reminiscing in a place like this, then it's only a matter of course it'd enter my ears."

Beatrice failed to pronounce even an "Ugh" as Roswaal shrugged.

—Not pertaining exclusively to the time within Sanctuary, meals were to be had with everyone as much as possible.

That was a precept established by the Witch Echidna, a decree neither Beatrice nor Ryuzu, nor even Roswaal could flout.

Although, just about the only one to feel tormented by this precept was Beatrice, being opposed to having to give company to Roswaal.

Ryuzu: "Roswaal-sama, would you also happen to harbor any interest in Beatrice-sama's prior life?"

Roswaal: "Of course. It's a shame Beatrice doesn't talk much about her past. Since we're often compared, I had heard about the presence of her so-called older brother, but…"

Beatrice: “You aren’t something worth even a comparison with Bubby, I suppose. Don’t be conceited, in fact.”

Roswaal: “Welp, that’s exactly what I’m talking about.”

Taking a path around the hotpot atop flames, Roswaal then boldly seated himself immediately beside Beatrice. Even when Beatrice shifted away, he consistently got that much closer and covered the distance in between.

The man possessed no other intent but to wholeheartedly make Beatrice boundlessly groan.

Roswaal: “It’s a chance to get closer to the enigmas of your Bubby. It also makes me really curious how your first adventure concluded, Beatrice.”

Ryuzu: “I am also incredibly curious about that. Will Toska-sama be able to protect his childhood friend?”

Finding an ally in the naive Ryuzu, Roswaal’s odious pupils gawped at Beatrice.

Of course, she did not have the option to not tell the rest after having come this far, but if that were to mean delighting Roswaal, it was simply human nature for her to fail recounting enjoyably.

Beatrice: “…Betty is an exalted Spirit, so human nature isn’t the correct term, I suppose.”

Roswaal: “There’s no need to fuss over such minute semantics. Now then, considering how I’m not even worth comparing to him, what feats will your splendid Bubby make I wonder?”

Beatrice: “Do you hold something against Bubby, in fact? So pigheaded, I suppose.”

Beatrice furrowed her brows in dubiousness, his speech coming off as strangely thorny in essence. But Roswaal provided no answer, as Ryuzu smiled bitterly, expression convoluted.

Beatrice: “It feels vaguely uncanny, but moving on, in fact. —After approximately ten days, Betty and the others arrived at Carnattse a day prior to the night of the full moon.”

Ryuzu: “Then, Beatrice-sama and the villagers worked together, and the Dragon extermination…”

Beatrice: “—Did not come to be, in fact.”

A thought dearth in appropriate vigilance toward the circumstance truly befitting of Ryuzu, but the reality did not unfold in identical vein.

With the gazes of the two listeners in mind, Beatrice returned to that night once again.

Beatrice: “The reason why he came to Betty and everyone’s place, was because he had no allies in the village, I suppose.”

2

Toska: “—Why, won’t everyone try to stand up!!”

An enraged bellow, in company of a mighty kick to the floor by Toska.

Having assessed him as the owner of a fairly composed personality for his age by dint of their meeting and journey, Beatrice was substantially astonished upon witnessing Toska’s exasperated form.

However, what astonished her furthermore, were the reactions of the dwellers of Carnattse who welcomed Toska.

A night preceding the promised night of full moon with the Blight Dragon, Toska had returned home bringing help from the Palace of the Witch. It would be appreciable should they be delighted about not having to sacrifice a young girl from the village.

In that case, despite feeling piqued by having to depend upon others, their purpose would have surely been fulfilled.

However, the responses they attained in reality ran counter to any such conjectures and expectations.

???: “What a foolish thing you’ve done, Toska. Went to the Witch of Wisdom’s place, and brought back the daughter of the Witch from there… how will we ever be able to pay any such recompense.”

A white-haired grandsire, the village headman mithered so with trembling vocals whilst solitarily facing Toska in his home.

Hearing this, the redness of Toska’s visage incremented further,

Toska: “I don’t mean to have everyone from the village shoulder the debt I’ve incurred! I arbitrarily went to the Witch-sama’s place. That’s why, I’ll pay for the recompense.”

Headman: “That’s only natural! Your actions were self-indulgent. However, it would’ve been better had that made for borrowing the Witch’s might…”

His words befogged midway through, the village headman’s cynic eye darted towards Beatrice and Puck.

His glance was unpleasant, but not to an unanticipated degree. Beatrice had simply an unamused expression. However, it was Toska who could not pardon this discourteous gaze.

Toska: “I implored Beatrice-sama and Puck-sama to come with me. Please do not direct a gaze of this kind towards them. I will, work together with the two of them and…”

Headman: “—Rescue Remina, you proclaim? Will you be able to oppose that fearsome Blight Dragon?”

“…”

Headman: “Foolish. Truly foolish, Toska. Why, did you leave the village? Had you remained in the village, you could’ve spent identical time with Remina albeit for a scant ten days.”

Articulating with pity, the village headman’s eyes turned to outside of the building. Beyond the window, visible far away was something akin to a shrine, the wooden door comprising its entrance tightly fastened.

Headman: “Remina is inside of the shrine. Preparing for tomorrow, she has commenced her ritual for purification. You shan’t even be allowed to meet her.”

Toska: “Remina…”

Headman: “Oh Toska, why must you have departed from the village. Should you have remained here, you would have made time and memories with Remina. The same way as you, Remina regarded you with fondness…”

Whether he set to chide him or was simply hopelessly inconsiderate, anyhow, the village headman’s remarks violated Toska’s fury which mustn’t be disturbed.

Toska glared at the village headman, canines bared,

Toska: “Remina! The one Remina loves, is not me, but big brother…! As Remina’s dad, shouldn’t you be the one who knows that the most!”

Relinquishing this assertion behind, Toska stormed out of the village headman’s home.

His tail jolted by the vigor of the fierce gale birthed by Toska, Puck exchanged a look with Beatrice. Beatrice drew her jaw in before Puck glided through the air and pursued the vanishing figure.

And, with Toska and Puck’s departure, the only ones left behind were Beatrice and the village headman.

Beatrice: “…Betty too, finds that to be quite witless, in fact. But, his judgement to depend on the Witch of Wisdom was correct, I suppose. Betty, is none other than the proxy of the Witch, in fact.”

Headman: “However, the pivotal Witch-sama remains in absentia. Is this not what epitomizes being deserted by fortune.”

Beatrice: “Right when you have a chance, do you intend to forgo the life of your own daughter, I suppose?”

Headman: “In exchange for the village?!”

Glowering at Beatrice, the village headman nailed his fist to the floor, giving rise to a report.

The rage and awareness dwelling in his gaze were proof of having compared the scales of his own daughter and the village, and having deliberated earnestly.

Henceforth, he had simply chosen his position as the chief of the village over his position as a father.

Headman: "…Toska was rash in his demands. By all means, please return."

Beatrice: "Blight Dragons… Dragons use mountains as dwellings. That remains unchanged, let it be labelled a Blight Dragon or not. It will settle on the mountain visible in the south of the village, I suppose. —The sacrifices, won't end with one, in fact."

"…"

Beatrice: "As uncouth as the name suggests, I suppose."

Dusting away the hem of her dress, Beatrice chose to excuse herself from the village headman as well.

By the very end as Beatrice was on the brink of exiting, she heard the village headman murmur "Remina…", yet Beatrice did not halt her steps.

However, from her exchange with the village headman and the villagers who shyed from showing themselves, she could tell.

Beatrice: "Not everyone, seems to have the mettle to battle the Blight Dragon, I suppose."

By the point of Toska's arrival at the Palace of the Witch all by himself, she had foreseen this to a certain extent.

Primarily, tackling the Palace of the Witch was standardly done after forming a clique. Setting about with a group of more than ten, yet the ones to reach the palace were a scant one or two, that was the class of trial it was.

Yet, Toska fulfilled it by himself. That did not allude to the aspect of his exiguous mobile ability and power of will alone, but also portended the negative of isolation.

Toska had no allies. —Nobody, was seeking to settle matters with the Blight Dragon.

Toska: "…I apologize for showing such a pathetic sight to you."

Beatrice was being guided to the rear of the shrine, having departed from the village headman's home and followed Puck's responses. There, Toska bowed and apologized, leaning on the fences enclosing the village.

Levitating beside him, Puck hugged his tail with a "Hmm".

Puck: "Was it pathetic? I feel like you're the only one not being pathetic in this village, though."

Beatrice: "Betty agrees, I suppose. For a human, you're on the better side, in fact."

Toska: "…Haha, that way of putting it would be a bit…"

Receiving Puck and Beatrice's comfort, a smile recrudesced onto Toska's expression.

Of course a mere bravado, but being cheered up meant being cheered up. Before it dwindled away, they must have the conversation they inevitably ought to.

Beatrice: "—It doesn't seem like there can be any allies found in this village who will assist you in battle, I suppose."

Puck: "Yeah, there's little hope. Seems everyone is so scared of the Blight Dragon that they've shut themselves in."

The village was a small and confined one. All within the village must have hearkened Toska's voice when he roared inside the village headman's home. Yet nobody attempted to come forth.

And Remina, isolated within the shrine calling the ritual for purification upon herself, was no exception.

Puck: “Won’t you call out to her?”

Toska: “—. After having yelled the pinnacle of patheticness just now?”

Gazing at the shrine, Toska responded to Puck, who tilted his neck.

His pessimism was only natural, considering Toska’s remarks shortly earlier. For the childhood friend he wished to rescue, Remina, the one she loved was not him but his elder brother.

Though judging solely from the hearsay they had learned here and there through the course of their journey, he seemed to be quite the unprecedented sort of personage.

Toska: “Had big brother been over here, we wouldn’t have had to worry about Remina becoming a sacrifice for the Dragon. I’m sure neither the village headman, nor the folks of the village, would’ve been afraid of the Dragon.”

“…”

Toska: “—But, the one over here is me. Me.”

She thought he would yet again itemize words lamenting his own powerlessness, gaze cast down. However, before the silent Beatrice and Puck, Toska marked brief words comprising the impetus to look forward by his own volition.

Toska bit his lips, clenched his fists, and mightily, powerfully, gripped the handle of the sword on his hip.

Toska: “So what if it’s a Blight Dragon. As if I’m ever going to hand Remina over to just a big lizard like that… Fighting with the Dragon, is way better than big brother’s knuckles.”

Beatrice: “That comparison is just weird, in fact…”

Puck: “But, gotta say, he’s got quite the boyish expression right there.”

Whether promising or pathetic, Beatrice slumped her shoulders seeing the way Toska resolved his determination. Yet Puck seemed to hold a different view, somehow appearing thrilled.

Beatrice: “Well, this is better for Betty than having to lend her strength to a coward, I suppose.”

She did not spend nine days and came all the way here in order to watch humans’ dispute. It was for the havoc enkindled by a Dragon—its breakthrough, and to prove.

The hand of salvation of the Witch of Wisdom sought by humans across the world, its definite might and promise.

Beatrice: “Betty and Bubby don’t have the option to withdraw to begin with, in fact. You will be held accountable for the responsibility of having brought us outside of that palace, I suppose.”

Toska: “…You’re truly unsparing, Beatrice-chan.”

Beatrice: “You… mgh.”

When she attempted to rebuke him that this was no time to interrupt, Toska’s mien intercepted her.

An earnest gaze and expression were a show of resolution. If referring to Beatrice so casually coincided with that in exchange, then she could overlook it at least this one time.

Beatrice: “However, you won’t be getting a second chance, in fact.”

Toska: “I am aware… It seems, we must work out a plan. Had we gotten more allies from the village, we could have charged into the Blight Dragon head-on, but.”

Puck: “You had such a thick-headed strategy? I’d say it’s a bit reckless against a Dragon.”

Even Puck was slightly astounded by a policy so erratic and haphazard. Same went for Beatrice, but now was the point in utmost need of Wisdom in this time’s situation.

Per Puck’s statement, challenging a Dragon head-on destitute of other measures was akin to suicide rather than simply being a poor plan.

As a matter of course, an ambush was necessary.

Beatrice: “Tomorrow night, what’s the arrangement for presenting the sacrifice going to be like, I suppose.”

Toska: “—? Halfway up the mountain in the south, Remina will be taken there and to the Blight Dragon”

Puck: “She will get proffered. Hmm hmm… Betty, think of anything?”

Beatrice visualized the programme for presenting the sacrifice within her mind, a hand positioned onto her chin. Taking a minute to ponder, the conclusion Beatrice subsequently reached was…

Beatrice: “From your childhood friend’s house, bring clothes deeply fragmented with her scent, in fact.”

Upon Beatrice’s instruction betraying expectations, Toska responded as though having forgotten his resentment and restlessness.

3

Toska: “—Once this ends, would you look at me a bit more instead of big brother?”

Before commencing action, Toska did not have any exchange with his childhood friend.

Simply leaning on the shrine’s wall, he unilaterally cast a wish.

No answer came to it, and even if it did, Toska surely did not wish for it to enter his ears. Thus, this was solely a rite necessary for the final push of his resolution.

Beatrice and Puck spoke naught, deeming that pointing this out would be boorish as well.

And the three mobilised action a night before the full moon—in other words, the very same day.

Beatrice: "…This mountain is a small, shabby, remote one, I suppose. Doesn't seem to be much of a sacred ground either, it's a mystery why a Dragon powerful in itself is still making this a part of its turf, in fact."

Puck: "Might be that there's a serious shortage of mountains. From what I heard, there's also Dragons who abandoned mountains for dwellings and are staying in castles after driving humans out of them. It's just hijacking at this point."

Beatrice: "What a savage thing to do, I suppose. They are just lizards with wings after all, in fact."

Puck: "Woah, go off Betty."

Puck voiced a restrained chuckle, the tip of his tail at his mouth. Tickling Puck's scruff, Beatrice moved her body and shifted her hips.

Parts of her body stiffened if she were to remain in the same position for long. —Beatrice had been crafted by her mother, a Witch, but such encumbrances of her body were no different from humans'.

Neither could she unfasten her body and slip into the mana in the air at will like Puck. The only reorganization permitted to Beatrice was solely the dress and hair comprising her guise.

Toska: "I say this again… but you two, seem to get along really well."

Toska murmured, somewhat nervously, watching the two siblings' frolic from close.

Even during the journey, Beatrice and Puck's laughs and teasing did not peter out. Had he been an impatient youngster, he must have indisputably detonated on some point midway through.

Or perhaps Toska was able to withstand such circumstances due to personal experience.

Beatrice: “Just as you can see, I suppose. And it looked like a lot of stuff happened with your real brother on your end, in fact.”

Toska: “Not at all. It’s just that big brother is someone who attracts people’s gazes, and I always stood stuck behind him. It’s because of that I wasn’t able to even get into the sight of the girl I like, that’s all.”

Puck: “Mmm, smells like bittersweet youth.”

Toska: “Yooth? I get what you mean by bittersweet though… I wonder if I’m yet immature.”

Toska’s query as he scratched his cheek made it difficult for Beatrice to answer with a “So immature!”.

She was aware of being incomparably more profoundly and richly abound in terms of knowledge than Toska, but in outline, Toska stood above Beatrice in terms of true age and years of experience.

Besides, she recalled problems in the sphere of love and affection having troubled and distressed even her mother.

Beatrice: “Betty will anyhow say nothing regarding the relation between you and the childhood friend… Betty also loves Bubby, but it appears it’s different from that.”

Toska: “When you say the two of you are siblings…”

Puck: “When made by the same person using the same technique, I’d say it counts as siblings by that point. Though me staying in that palace with Betty is like a period of preparation before I live independently.”

Beatrice: “Live independently…”

Puck’s indifferent say plunged Beatrice into solitude.

One day, Puck will depart from that palace and leave to search for something solely his own. She had heard about that before, and as long as it was concerned with Puck's mission, Beatrice couldn't impede either.

For the crafted lives that were Artificial Spirits, the meaning for being born was the weightiest, most exalted and valuable of all.

Toska: "The meaning for being born, is it…"

Beatrice: "You all are different from Betty and Bubby, I suppose. For how short lived you are, search for it with the utmost of all your might, in fact. Tonight, Betty will make time for that, I suppose."

Not for a conferred mission, but they must determine the path to walk on, to live on by oneself.

It could be that the path remained beyond discovery, and they very much lost their way. Beatrice regarded them, who walked such thorned paths, such unilluminated nights, with commiseration.

It was for this reason that the doors of the palace of the Witch of Wisdom reigned open to those harboring any wishes—.

Toska: "Beatrice-sama…"

Beatrice: "Hmp, still too early for gratitude, in fact. Even if you've been overwhelmed with emotion, save it for after everything's been cleaned up, I suppose."

Toska: "No, no that, your elbow's touching me and it hurts, would you mind shifting aside a bit?"

Beatrice: "You really have a serious lack of respect for Betty, in fact!"

Beatrice yelled, just when she thought what it was that he was about to say with such a meek tone. Toska expressed a wry smile to her angry remark, but the distance between her and his face was bizarrely close.

That was a matter of course, at present, Beatrice and Toska, along with Puck, were so to speak glued together. They had all gotten inside a single laundry basket, their breaths concealed—were in the midst of concealing, fundamentally.

Utilizing the laundry basket which the sacrifice had been in as camouflage, they shall ambush thereon. That was the entirety of the Blight Dragon extermination operation.

Puck: “It’s simple, but there’s no need to make things complex. Betty and I don’t have scents like ordinary creatures, so it won’t come off as odd even if we’re with Toska.”

Toska: “When I was told to go steal Remina’s clothes, and when I was glutted with cold water, I was beginning to doubt what all you were making me do but… makes sense.”

Beatrice: “Erasing your personal scent and overriding it with the childhood friend’s scent instead, I suppose. Women’s scents are acute, the Dragon will surely get beguiled too, in fact.”

All they had to do was to await until eventually it negligently drew near in order to ascertain the laundry basket’s content.

Should they win the minimum of its unpreparedness and opportunity, the rest would then be Beatrice and Puck’s stage. Should it come close enough to enter a sword’s range, then Toska’s sword strikes would also attain a window.

Sooner or later…

Toska: “I hold no objections, but the way you phrased that…”

Puck: “Now now, Betty is thinking in Toska’s best interest… That being said, getting into a laundry basket and awaiting a dragon, not a monster. I fee~l like there was some folktale like this.”

Toska: “Folktale? Of what kind would that be?”

Inside of the tightly packed laundry basket, as though averting his eyes from the amplifying insecurity and nervousness, Toska bit at the chitchat Puck proposed.

Puck: “Ermm~, it’s pretty similar to our current situation. An evil monster settled beside a certain village, and made a ruckus demanding a sacrifice to be offered. And so, it welcomed not only the sacrifice but also booze and stuff, and when the monster completely fell asleep like a baby they perfectly sliced off its head."

Toska: "…It would be great if it all were to go so smoothly."

The circumstances certainly resembled each other significantly, but the fashion in which Puck narrated it insinuated it to be a fable for children. The wryly smiling Toska seemed to have reckoned the same. On the other hand, Beatrice wielded a separate impression.

Beatrice: "Betty does not know of that story, I suppose. Bubby is so well-informed, in fact."

Puck: "It's just a matter of chance, a matter of chance. I don't really remember where I heard it from that well either. But isn't it a bit reassuring to think there's been predecessors?"

If someone had succeeded in monster extermination in an analogous situation, then their plan will surely go well too.

Such optimistic views of Puck certainly heartened Beatrice and Toska.

"…"

Thereon their dialogue diminished, as they awaited that moment to pay a call.

It was a night prior to the originally promised one. They possessed no proof the Dragon would come to inspect this laundry basket. However, if this mountain had become the Dragon's turf, then it would come to ascertain the foreign object set by its footstep.

For that was the attribute of the creatures who placed the world under their reign, called as Dragons.

Whilst awaiting the Dragon's visit, Beatrice incidentally thought. — That should this first task of her's be wrapped up safely, would her mother even commend her.

Puck: "If you lend this much of a hand, then it will have gone slightly astray from her policy of self-help endeavors, after all.”

As though having read through Beatrice’s heart, Puck’s pinpointing stung sharp to her chest.

The Witch Echidna who granted wisdom, her policy fundamentally was to present a solution before those who reached the palace and for them to apply it as the problem’s resolution by themselves.

In a majority of cases, humans sought immediate solutions to problems. However, focusing entirely on reliance they did not wish for growth, and lost sight of means to rescue their own self was her mother’s idea.

Beatrice endorsed this idea, very much so, and believed normally resolutions must be won by the diligent endeavors of the party concerned, but…

Beatrice: “This time is an exception, a special case, I suppose. There won’t, won’t be a second time, in fact.”

Puck: “Hehe, hope so… Betty, Toska.”

Followed by a short laugh, Puck’s faintly lowered voice called Beatrice and Toska.

The instant they received it, Beatrice and Toska’s nervousness elevated to its topmost. And simultaneously, Its arrival was sensed by their instinct before any of the five senses.

—Since time immemorial, It descended from the skies high above.

Flapping those potent wings, the monarch of aerial creatures that monopolized the sky.

The being fated to be a ruler by birth, its valiant advent.

[—]

An absolute being that hustled aside every other, whose presence alone jolted the atmosphere. Conjecturing it was immediately close through its pressure and the tremor caused by it stepping foot onto the ground, Beatrice halted her breath.

Had Beatrice possessed a beating heart, it must have undoubtedly simmered vehemently like a hotpot verging on exploding upon sensing this existence up close.

Through their journey, they had purported them as mere lizards with wings and fools who wallowed in their own strength, and though these had been their genuine beliefs, they were also simultaneously a bluff and part of their unwillingness to admit defeat.

They needed to coax themselves into believing Dragons were trifling beings, because they knew if they did not do so they would be rendered immobile when meeting the real one.

Inside the same laundry basket, Beatrice could hear Toska's heartbeat.

Toska, cheeks stiff, perspired sweat through his whole body without pause. Status akin to all biological responses of the body except for the heart having simultaneously come to a halt.

Prior to dying, the body had commenced conscious preparation for Death.

She could understand that feeling painfully well. She need not know what the ache of which part would be like…

Puck: "—Betty."

In the midst of such delirious entanglement of consciousness, a tender voice connected with Beatrice's earlobe.

A quick glance to the side, there present was Puck nestling by her cheekbone. Her tender brother, his black eyes narrowed, enquired Beatrice.

Puck: "Do I do it?"

The question was one she had been asked countless times throughout this journey.

And on every instance of this question, Beatrice presumed upon Puck's heart…

Beatrice: "Thank you, I suppose, Bubby."

She mustn't presume upon Puck anymore.

This was something Beatrice had started, and something Beatrice must fulfill.

For this was a trial incumbent to accomplish the mission Beatrice had been born with.

And…

Beatrice: "—Minya."

Accepting the push of resolve, Beatrice chanted.

The polished mana meddled with the world, the alteration thus born instantaneously derived results.

Light, was emitted out the laundry basket and laid a direct hit onto the opponent.

Toska: "—~hk."

She felt Toska gulp a breath, right beside.

However, she had not the time to be mindful of his astonishment. She solely bid to decimate the opponent with her all.

Beatrice: "Minya, Minya, Minya, Minya."

Materialized with each shout were lethal stakes shimmering in purple brought forth by Yin magic, Minya.

Manifest as purple crystals, they were a category of forbidden curses that froze the target's time, attenuating their existence itself and shattering them—an attack before whom no flesh body, no matter how robust or able, held any significance.

Dragon's scales which not even steel could scathe were no exception, the only options to counter being either to dodge or to be clad in mana firm enough to withstand any intervention of magic.

However, negligence lost the Dragon of both said options.

Beatrice: “Minya, Minya!”

Puck: “Betty, calm down.”

Beatrice: “Minya! Minya! Minya! Minya~!!”

Puck: “Betty!”

Beatrice cannonaded magic with undivided attention before Puck clung to her face. Her awareness robbed by the soft sensation, Beatrice returned to composure.

She had been attacking toward the gargantuan silhouette before her eyes, entirely absorbed. A disgrace. Should the opponent rebrace its stance and counterattack, her eyes would fail to even spot it.

However, Beatrice’s such anxieties were nothing more than needless.

Puck: “It’s over, Betty. The Dragon isn’t moving anymore.”

Beatrice: “Eh…”

Once Puck moved aside from Beatrice’s face, her breaths hoarse, her field of vision opened.

A beat later, the sound akin to thirsted frosting entered Beatrice’s ears as well. And what was reflected in her now opened gaze was the majestic stature of the Dragon looking down upon the laundry basket…

Its height enough to direct gazes upward, at a distance of about ten meters close. Closely packed scales shrouding its whole body, enormous wings that pirouetted its gargantuan build in the air. Its claws and fangs so fiendishly sharp they could tear into an iron armor like candy, befitting of a species counted as standalone cataclysms.

However, never again would anyone be tormented by this cataclysm.

For the Dragon's frame had sustained the stillness of time, having transmuted into purple crystals.

Toska: "This, easily…"

Puck: "This is how fights where one side is lying in wait fully prepared go. Striking with the greatest possible strength and crushing the enemy in one go. Betty's plan was the correct answer by far."

Sermoning the dumbfounded Toska, Puck gently levitated away from the partly destroyed laundry basket. Going further upward, Puck positioned himself still before the now crystallized Dragon.

And, gently caressed the Dragon's muzzle with the tip of his stretched tail.

—The following moment, crevices formed from the point he caressed and the entire frame of the Blight Dragon shattered and dissipated.

Only glistening fragments remained, for the end of a Blight Dragon who tormented many, an exceedingly short demise and no other way to describe it.

Puck: "Flawless performance, Betty. Toska too, thank you for your hard work."

Toska: "Um… I've done, nothing… truly, absolutely nothing, so."

Both Beatrice and Toska identically felt how anticlimactic this was.

Of course, it was not as though they wished to play a fierce skirmish with the Blight Dragon. The primary factor jeopardizing the village now gone, they had attained a perfect victory with not as much as a scratch, the results were in fact to an unforeseen extent.

Henceforth, they had not been particularly pitched into a state of ecstasy either.

Toska: “I’ve truly, done no…”

Beatrice: “—Without losing heart, you sought salvation from Mother. It can be said however many times, but that is your achievement, in fact.”

Toska: “Beatrice-sama…”

Insisted Beatrice to Toska, who failed to escape his astonishment.

Beatrice’s mind too was steadily, gradually reorganized, giving rise to comprehension. That they had safely succeeded in subjugating the Blight Dragon, and fulfilled Toska’s purpose—Beatrice’s mission.

For the first time ever since she was born, she exited the palace, embarked on a journey, and, killed a Living Being.

That her first kill was a Blight Dragon was quite the gallant record she had etched in her own history.

Beatrice: “A weak human depending on wisdom and connection to defeat a strong enemy is not a bad thing, I suppose. However, it’s no good to become completely reliant, in fact. Don’t get carried away and think you’ll have another chance hereon, I suppose.”

To have this presumed upon and be depended upon each time something occurred would run counter to her mother’s policy. Neither did Beatrice wish to save a human of such nature, either.

Thus…

Toska: “—. I understand. But, thank you very much. Thanks to the two of you, the village, Remina, was saved.”

Thus, Beatrice deemed Toska’s disposition, this being his answer, to be on the good side for a human.

His smile was yet powerless, and needed to digest a lot, which she could sympathize with.

Even so, Toska nonetheless looked forward.

Beatrice: “Well, say your thanks not to Betty but to the proprietor of the palace, Mother, in fact. To the utmost, Betty is only a proxy for Mother, I suppose.”

Puck: “You can never be honest hu~h, Betty… Anyhow, it was pretty unexpected. I had braced myself thinking it’d be a bigger, more powerful Dragon.”

Looking down onto the shattered fragments of the Dragon, Puck swayed his tail by the point its shattered cranium had been. Upon Puck’s words Beatrice glanced a quick view of the fragments and furrowed her brows.

Exactly as Puck’s words, it all felt a bit too fast regardless of the ambush’s success. The Dragon was an individual too, so it was possible this one was a special faux, but…

Beatrice: “—Could it be.”

Yes, the foreboding that erred Beatrice’s mind was synchronous with the situation’s alteration.

Toska: “—ah.”

Eyes dilated, frozen motionless, Toska stepped back whilst looking up to the sky.

Following the course of his gape, Beatrice and Puck also comprehended what made him harbor this terror.

—Ahead was, a silhouette calmly airborne in the night sky soaring toward them.

Beatrice: “…It all did seem a bit too easy, in fact.”

Beatrice reaffirmed, had she possessed a heart it must have been pounding with vehemence once again.

A small Dragon under its command, the Blight Dragon who truly placed Mount Carnattse under its reign—a Dragon boasting scales of silver.

That was what slowly descended before the immobilized three.

4

Taking gigantic laps around Mount Carnattse, what steadily descended to take foot before them was a Dragon of silver.

Prior to the beauty of its scales or remarkable pupils adorned with erudite intellect, came its gargantuan size.

If the Dragon they had defeated was ten meters in length, then the one before them now was easily more than thrice its size. Dragons thirty meters huge could only be seen on notably sacred mountains.

However, the Silver Dragon was enshrined before Beatrice and the group's eyes, as a being of reality.

Toska: "—Wo, ah."

A groan escaped Toska's throat, engulfed into the Dragon's majestic dignity and the glint in its eye.

He was not the slightest of a coward. Bearing in mind the heroism and valor he had tackled the palace of a nebulous Witch for the sake of his childhood friend with, he could forthright be labelled a prominent hero even amongst all of humanity. For the same Toska, the Silver Dragon bore overwhelming spirit that mutilated sanity.

And sustaining pressure identical to Toska, Beatrice attained a certain realization.

"…"

Judging from Toska's reaction the Dragon before their eyes was none other than the true Blight Dragon that demanded sacrifice from the village.

However, never did Toska inform them that there were a plurality of Dragons. Look to him at the side and it could be understood with ease that he did not know that either.

Multiple Dragons, that too of this colossal size, had established a mountain so tiny as their base.

The circumstances veiled on the flip side, their answer was evident.

Beatrice: “You all, had destroying the village as your purpose from the very beginning, I suppose…!”

???: [—Thou killed mine brethren, didn’t thee, oh bawbling ones.]

The deep, grousing voice of the Dragon descended upon them as though ridiculing Beatrice’s mutters.

Having lived through umpteen years, the Dragon in acquisition of intellect could comprehend human speech. —To go back on that, the origin of which amongst humans, Spirits or Dragons first began talking in words would also be something of immense interest.

That was how overwhelmingly daunting the Silver Dragon was, impelling one to rend their thoughts with such escapism.

???: [Thou killed mine brethren, didn’t thee. Oh bawbling ones.]

Beatrice: “…You’re audible loud and clear, no need to repeat yourself, in fact. Your purpose is to”

???: [Then, we has’t only one behest. To exact retribution upon the fallen scales of mine brethren.]

The Silver Dragon’s voice, abounding in dignity, was chaperoned by profoundness rather than conceiving might. Feeling as not the wind after drenching downpours, but the sensation of plummeting toward a bottomless seabed.

Coincidentally, Beatrice realized they had granted it a pretext.

The Dragon they had initially ambushed had been the opponent’s trap itself. —Beatrice, had given the Dragon a reason to take revenge.

Amongst Dragons existed rare cases who had formed pacts with humans, probing for a path of coexistence. However, should retribution be hailed as a just cause then even they would make no attempt to readily mediate.

She shall straightforwardly admit they got trapped inside a scrupulous scheme. However, she bore a doubt.

Beatrice: “Why do you go so far to target this village, I suppose. Judging by a glance, it’s just a remote village with nothing special, in fact.”

A sacred mountain of no sizable worth, and a village too small to scramble for.

Blight Dragons who simply enjoyed persecuting the weak were not few, but the Silver Dragon before their eyes demarcated a line from paltry Dragons like those.

Upon Beatrice’s question, the Silver Dragon aimed its crystalline golden pupils upon Toska.

???: [It is patent. —Destroy that redhead’s lineage.]

Toska: “…M-Me?”

Abruptly elevated onto the stage, Toska was acutely bewildered.

The Silver Dragon’s leer directly lanced Toska. That Dragon, would not jest. Hence, if so, then the Silver Dragon’s aim lay neither in the village nor in the sacrifice, but in Toska.

Puck: “Lineage, so precisely Toska’s kin I’m guessing? I don’t really get what it means, though.”

The Silver Dragon’s glare focused on him, Toska’s breathing plunged into disarray, devoid of any such idea. Puck descended to his shoulder and caressed his cheek in an attempt to calm him, whilst beside them Beatrice embraced identical dubiety.

What was there that could grant significance to its aim being Toska’s family.

???: [—The other day, Amangam of the east hath fallen and weyrs of Silver Dragons splintered in every direction. We too art a weyr splintered hence upon losing our pillar.]

Beatrice: “Amangam… the one who controls eastern lands, head of Silver Dragons? It fell, I suppose?!”

???: [—Precisely.]

Beatrice was staggered by the words the Silver Dragon communicated.

Dragons formed weyres throughout the world on all kinds of lands, but they had factions therein and any representative ones that spearheaded them were famous across the world.

The Amangam who controlled the east which the Silver Dragon had spoken of, was one who spearheaded one such weyre. And, if the downfall of the head of Silver Dragons was the genesis of Toska’s family being aimed after.

Beatrice: “Could it be, do you mean that this man’s family is involved in the fall of the head of Silver Dragons, in fact?!”

???: [—Following the blood, hath reached this land. Nay err.]

That it was a contention of the Blight Dragon—no, the proud Silver Dragon, meant this was a deed of conviction.

And whilst Beatrice digested this truth, behind her, Toska lost strength in his legs. Puck still atop his shoulder, Toska kneeled, stupefied with his eyes fixed onto the ground,

Toska: “…It’s big brother.”

He whispered, his tone one of despair.

Puck: “Big brother… you mean that older brother of yours whom you frequently mentioned, Toska?”

Catching his utterances Puck enquired back, to which Toska nodded. He then moved his lips, quaking in fear, and wrung out a voice pronouncing “That’s how it’s always been…!”.

Toska: “Always getting into trouble and being a nuisance… at last, just when I thought he arbitrarily left the village, this time he killed the leader of a group of Dragons, and they’ve come to take revenge on me and the village… wh-why, for what…!”

The fierce elder brother whom Toska had often brought up.

It had seemed as though he had distorted a sense of inferiority in Toska pertaining to his elder brother, enlarging his idolized image, but it appeared that the matter was not so simple—no, not so complex.

Toska, did not doubt that his elder brother killed the head of Dragons which even the Silver Dragon before their eyes obeyed.

And much to their dread, neither did the Silver Dragon repudiate Toska’s ideas.

It was simple. Toska’s tellings until now had all been fact, and his elder brother was a monster exceeding norms. For it was that monster who felled the head of Silver Dragons…

Beatrice: “As retribution for the fall of their leader, the Silver Dragons targeted the culprit’s family… Truly straightforward and unheeding to appearances, I suppose. The name and reputation of the Dragon clan will weep, in fact.”

???: [Speak per thy liking as long as thou art unacquainted with that being. That being shalt fell all what is nowise human. Oh Spirits, thou art nay exception either.]

Puck: “It’s enough to hold Dragons in crisis, it’s really no matter we can just laugh off as an exaggeration, you know?”

Beatrice and Puck, the Dragon chimed a warning bell for the two who were Spirits as well.

Was that how tremendous the might of Toska’s elder brother was. Potency to which even Dragons yielded, he may possibly qualify to count as an absolute personage ranking on par with the Witches.

The feeling of one’s heart being daunted before far too inordinate an existence was something Beatrice could empathize with too.

Beatrice: “But, sad to say. If it is to kneel before someone identically inordinate, then that person has already been decided, I suppose.”

???: [—Regrettable.]

Hearing Beatrice’s caustic remark, the Silver Dragon honed the glint in its eye, surmising they wouldn’t withdraw.

Its golden eyes that conceived brimming intellect steadily transformed into ones enveloped in rage and bellicosity, synchronously the atmosphere quaked, the ground agitated, and rained the premonition of Death upon the opposition.

Swallowed by the pressure of this Silver Dragon, before the battle even commenced Toska became unable to…

Beatrice: “—Stand in fact, Toska!”

However, Beatrice’s voice powerfully smited the shrunken, unmoving Toska.

Toska elevated his visage, looking at Beatrice with eyes startled.

Beatrice had turned her eyes away from the fearsome Silver Dragon and was staring in Toska’s direction. The Dragon’s intimidation piercing the side of her face was dreadful, even inducing the hallucination of her entire body being whittled.

But, she gnashed her molars and withstood it, glaring at Toska.

Beatrice: “Voice your wish I suppose, Toska. —Betty is Mother’s proxy! The daughter of the Witch Echidna, who grants means to fulfill the frantic wishes of humans, in fact!”

Toska: “I, am…”

Beatrice: “Now, it is time to fulfill your wish, I suppose!!”

Beatrice held her hand out, pointing towards the Silver Dragon before their eyes.

Beholding this, Toska gnashed his molars with force. Light rebounded to his blue eyes which had forfeited their strength, gripping to the handle of the sword by his hip, the youth stood up, his hair so red as to be set ablaze.

Toska: “I am… I am! I am, going to take Remina as my wife! I’ve loved her since long before!”

Beatrice: “You-, the wish-… agh! Even that works at this point in fact!”

Toska: “I’ll protect the village! Even if nobody fights alongside me, they split food with me when I felt hungry! They sheltered me when I cried after big brother hit me! I, love everyone!”

Beatrice: “More! More I suppose!”

Toska: “As if I’m ever going to give up, because of some nuisance big brother brought with him! You bloody, damn, shitty little big brother! The next time you come back, I’ll have you hold your nephews or nieces in your arms!!”

Hollering, Toska drew the sword from his hip.

A tawdry, crudely made sword, nevertheless in these moments shimmered with the hero’s spirit.

As Toska braced it straight ahead, by his side Beatrice and Puck exchanged a glance.

The opponent was Silver Dragon, a herculean individual thirty meters in size, Beatrice was a novice who had just experienced Killing for the first time a couple of moments ago, a three person troupe with no coordination or anything.

However, through these nine days, they spent their days and nights together, their bond albeit transient and brittle, was definite.

Consequently…

Toska: “—Come at us, lizard bastard! I’ll turn you into a wedding dinner!”

Receiving this proclamation, the Silver Dragon lightly widened its eyes.

And…

Fargall: [I, art one who shalt avenge the head of Silver Dragons—Fargall.]

"…"

Fargall: [—Though a misdirected retribution, I shalt destroy adversaries of mine family by blood.]

Blood relative of the fallen head of Silver Dragons, the Dragon—no, Fargall unfurled its wings.

A violent current furiously blew, the shockwave cleaved the earth, swallowing the three within. But, the pressure of that gale and tremor immediately vanished.

Puck: [Didn't I tell you? That I'm an ally to maidens in love and youthful youngsters.]

Ahead of Beatrice and Toska, that which instantly expanded his presence—no, his mass and transfigured his body into one on par with the Silver Dragon's, was Puck.

Having transformed his adorable outward appearance into a ginormous beast, Puck commanded a view above even the Silver Dragon.

Puck: [It's just that I'm still practicing it. So I can't make it last for too long.]

Fargall: [—Spirit.]

Beatrice: "Understandable, but you're going to regret it if you fall for Bubby."

Thus blew a gale glaciating the world, amidst the white that chilled even the Dragon, Beatrice made her move as well.

Purple arrows infinite were nocked in the environs, and the battle of the Witch’s proxy…

—The battle of the Silver Dragon subjugation, commenced.

5

Fargall: [—Gyaaaas.]

The battle began with a dragon breath, a misapprehension of the world being rocked intermingling within.

She had entered the battle after quite the grandstanding but Beatrice’s combat ability was by no means great.

Despite abounding in disposition and talent, her lack of experience in real battling shan’t turn traitor to victory or defeat. In this battle against the Silver Dragon, Beatrice possessed not a single decisive blow up her sleeve.

However, that did not make for Beatrice being luggage unable to battle.

Beatrice: “El Minya~a~a~a—~hk!!”

Lightening the weight of her body, Beatrice fusilladed a hail of purple arrows whilst dancing in the wind.

Unlike the Dragon taken out in the ambush, Fargall’s scales were clad in powerful mana. They impetuously diminished the might of magic, a firm armor that shielded its body.

Beatrice’s bombardment thwarted by the armor, not even as slight as a single strike connected.

However…

Puck: [Hiya~a~a~a~a~a~a—!!”

The star beastified Puck’s enormous forelimbs placed a firm hit onto the Silver Dragon’s trunk. The Dragon in a matter of moments attempted to brace its legs but the ground below its feet crystallized and shattered.

Minya stopped time of not just living creatures. Inorganic substances could be its targets as well.

Its brace proving to be fruitless, the Silver Dragon directly received Puck's robust arm. The gargantuan build akin to an amalgamation of multiple gigantic trees was thrown into the air as though weightless, and the blizzard toward that direction intensified.

The rampaging wind clad itself in blades of frost and charged towards the Silver Dragon imprisoned therein.

The might of the minor tempest was immense, some offhand Dragon would have gotten trapped within the instant it got touched, its body minced to a million shreds.

However, the opponent was no offhand Dragon, its pedigree and existence as an individual were all of the highest order.

Fargall: [—Gyaaaas!!]

Smashing through the tempest via the current birthed upon unfurling its closed wings, the following moment, a heat ray varnished the world in silver.

The heat wave released by the Silver Dragon approached Beatrice, killing even sound. —No, Beatrice simply happened to be in its trajectory. However, it was sufficient to rob her life in the aftermath.

Within that juncture, as Beatrice stood ready for Death, Puck swooped in ahead and accepted the heat ray.

A groan escaped the depths of his bulky throat before Beatrice instantly clung to the feet of her elder brother. Clinging to his long fur, she cheered her elder brother withstanding this agony with her all.

Potentially that bore its fruits, Puck forcefully turned his frame and escaped the heat ray, looking back to Beatrice who grasped his fur and then swung down his gigantic arm.

Synchronized with the movement of his arm, multiple house-sized floes of ice drew towards the Dragon.

The Silver Dragon countered them, some were repelled by the heat ray, others by the Dragon's wings or dragon claws, and attempted to launch a pursuit towards Puck.

However…

Toska: "—A~a~a~a~a~argh!!"

Flew out a bloody Toska, having slipped into the smashed ice floes.

Amidst the unheeding decisive battle of human and Dragon, bearing innumerable wounds throughout his body, Toska nonetheless did not allow for his fighting spirit to falter and assailed the Silver Dragon head-on.

A silver flash swung, a strike composed of all his might afflicted upon the Dragon's bulky, burly neck.

A strike of utterly perfect timing and sword technique. —What was lacking, was defense.

Toska: "—~hk."

A shrill note resounded, by the point the edge of his sword was rammed into the Dragon's neck, it fractured.

Toska's beloved sword that had supported the battle until now had been a single tread lacking in slashing the Silver Dragon's scales. As is, the Silver Dragon narrowed its eyes toward the mid-air Toska, now rendered defenseless.

The subsequently launched dragon claw, was perhaps an attack lacquered with honor and respect toward the warrior.

However, no matter what sentiment those claws were imbued with, it meant no change in the consequence they yielded. A singular claw was large enough to rip the body of a human.

In but a blink, the existence named Toska altered into a spray of blood…

Fargall: [—What?]

In the midst of battle, there existed not even the scope to spin words of significance.

This applied to both the Dragon and them, yet the Dragon's unrest for the first time quaked the atmosphere.

Fargall ought to have seized Toska in the claw strike, and brought his existence to complete ruin. However Toska, who ought to have perished, fluttered through the air via fearsome impact, not dead nevertheless.

Beatrice: "—Murak."

A hand upraised, Beatrice casted magic towards Toska the second he was going to be attacked.

Not a consequence foreplanned, but the optimum solution complying with the situation derived instinctively.

When he was about ensnared in the claws, she made Toska's body light like fluff and the wind pressure and impact of the claws escaped him from any fatal wounds.

The result, Toska barely managed to cling to his life.

Fargall: [Regardless—!]

Despite eluding it once, the consequence named Death was inexorable.

In order to prove this, the glint in Fargall's eye arrested the airborne Toska. Gaping its mouth wide open, the setup to fire a heat ray was completed in the span of a breath.

The inferno that scorched the world silver, paid no heed to the weight of the target to be scorched to ruin.

The tip of this ruin trivialized Toska. —It was on the brink of doing so, when.

???: “—Toska!”

A clamorous voice, not belonging to anyone present here.

The voice of someone Beatrice, Puck and even Fargall were unbeknownst of.

A voice that solely Toska, hovering in the air, knew whom it belonged to.

—Remina.

Toska’s lips moved so, as his blue pupils discerned the form of a slender young girl underneath trespassing onto Mount Carnattse, now a battlefield.

The girl grasped crude steel unbefitting her hands. Holding it aloft, with all her strength, she flung it in Toska’s direction.

The whirling object was same as one that had fractured earlier, a tawdry sword…

Fargall: [However, I shan’t allow it to reach—]

Puck: [I wouldn’t be so sure! I’m an ally to maidens in love, after all!]

The Silver Dragon set to deliver the finishing blow before the sword reached Toska. Its oral cavity attempted to heave the heat ray, when an impact from below overbearingly shut it close and misdirected its aim.

The silver inferno lost of destination exploded within its mouth, and the Silver Dragon greatly recoiled from the impact.

His entire body scorched, smeared in wounds, it was Puck’s attack—no, that was not an attack, he simply enlarged by the Dragon’s feet, a mere vigorless body collision. However, the hero plunged into the priceless interval it nonetheless bore.

Toska: “Wo-Woa~a~a~a~a~a~a~ah—!”

Receiving the hurled katana, Toska dropped towards the Silver Dragon’s direction after having turned his body.

Innumerable sword strikes struck the Dragon’s scales, repelled by their firmness, gouged them, repelled yet again, repeating this cycle he resumed to etch a gash.

Its flesh and blood gouged, the Dragon shrieked. A rigid sound reverberated, the katana snapped from the middle yet again.

However, toward Toska who lost his sword…

“Toska—!!”

The voice calling him was accompanied by a successively hailed rain of identically dull katanas.

Look there and stood beside the girl who had hastened to this place, the entire strength of Carnattse with the village headman standing first. In other words, the sum of hurled katanas was fifty,

Toska: “Hirya~a~a~a~a~a~a~a~a—~hk!”

He caught the katana thrown toward him in his right hand and drove in lethal slashes whilst his left hand caught the next one. Turning his body, each time resounded the echo of shattering steel, Toska gripped a new sword in his hands and abraded the scales of silver.

Born there in a trice was a transcendent swordsman who manipulated swords as extensions of his limbs.

Fargall: [—Oh kinsman, of red hair!]

Eyes dilated, the Silver Dragon Fargall aimed at Toska’s build whilst its own was being hashed.

The golden eyes until the very end, fumbled for a way to guard the Dragon clan…

Beatrice: “—Minya.”

The purple stakes Beatrice fired pierced the Dragon’s widened golden pupils from the front.

Its eyes unprotected by scales crystallized and vision that renunciated its duty lost sight of Toska.

—A silver flash, severed the Dragon’s burly throat till the middle, determining the outcome of battle.

6

Looking down onto the hunched Silver Dragon, Toska exhaled a white puff, drenched in blood.

Towards Toska came running the young girl who had first rushed here. She leapt onto him, both collapsing within the Dragon’s blood together.

Beatrice: “Ah, quite the foolhardiness that girl caused, I suppose. She has him wrapped around her finger, in fact.”

Puck: “Could be. Nonetheless, this means love wins in the end.”

Whilst viewing Toska and Remina exchange words within a fountain of blood from afar, Beatrice shrugged as a shrunken Puck came to her.

The exhaustion that came with undoing star beastification seemed rather intense, his form now about twice as smaller than usual.

Beatrice: “That’s how adorable Bubby is, I suppose. Betty is madly in love at this point, in fact.”

Puck: “Ahaha, though if I’m this small it’s trouble in a lot of ways so I’m quite the troublemaker~. Nevertheless… hm, I guess it’s all possible.”

Beatrice quietly assented to Puck’s words as he nodded a couple of times.

On the other side of the frolicking couple lay a powerlessly collapsed Silver Dragon, decapitated. A fearsome Dragon who truly possessed herculean strength. Victory would have been beyond their reach had they lacked even a single person on their side.

This included the villagers who mustered their courage and hastened here wielding swords midway through.

Fargall: [—Splendid, oh children of men.]

Toska: "—~hk! Stand back, Remina! It can, still talk huh…!"

Toska exercised vigilance toward the possibility of the victory they had caught hold of after crossing a brittle tightrope being jolted. However, Fargall appeared to be on the verge of death even from an outsider's perspective, and was not going to persist for long.

The Silver Dragon had been bested in the struggle for survival, and shall fall without exacting revenge on the enemies of its kin.

Beatrice: "A wrongly aimed revenge at that, I suppose. It's on you to have pulled an unnecessary stunt and lowered the Dragon clan's numbers, in fact."

Fargall: [Certes… It was, splendid. However.]

Beatrice: "…However?"

She thought it would act as a poor loser, however, the Dragon shan't do something so low. Then what did it intend, the moment she conceived this doubt, its answer arrived a moment later.

Puck: "—They got us."

Murmured Puck, looking up to the sky.

Lured by his voice Beatrice raised her countenance as well, and gulped a breath upon witnessing the identical spectacle.

It was, menace that rivalled the time when Fargall had earlier appeared—no, a spectacle exceeding that.

Shouldering the final fragment which the white moon lacked before becoming a full moon, silhouettes drew close whilst flapping their wings.

Though their size was not on par with the Silver Dragon before their eyes, their numbers unveiled despair. Above ten, above twenty, above thirty, not even fifty but nearly a hundred in count, a weyr of Silver Dragons.

This was the raid of the weyr of Dragons who sensed crisis upon the future of the Dragon clan after the fall of the head of Silver Dragons of the east.

Beatrice and team, who had just brought out and exhausted their all, couldn't possibly ever oppose them.

Puck: "What do we do, Betty?"

Beatrice: "…Only thing possible is for Bubby and Betty to buy time, I suppose."

Puck: "We might be able to. If in that window Toska is able to take the villagers… or in the worst case scenario, just Remina away, would it count as our task being done?"

Puck's usual attitude before the weir of Dragons close to a hundred in count was exceedingly heartening. Following the example of the ever composed and optimistic stance of her elder brother, Beatrice pressed and ceased her knees from shivering.

However…

Toska: "Please wait. I cannot cause you any more trouble. "

It was none other than Toska to impede upon the two's resolve.

Making Remina stand, Toska, his entire build bedaubed in Dragon's blood, shoved her in Beatrice's direction and,

Toska: "The Dragons' aim are big brother's relatives… they will never overlook me. If anything"

Beatrice: “You’re telling us to leave you here and escape with the childhood friend and villagers, I suppose. That’s, that’s absolutely never going to happen, in fact!”

Toska: “For what reason! You two, have no reason to stake your lives here…”

For the sake of a village they were unassociated with, she staked her life upon a mere request.

Toska bayed that he could not comprehend this attitude of Beatrice’s, his visage verging onto crying. To his question Beatrice laid a hand on her slim chest, and responded.

Beatrice: “—That is, Betty’s role. To devote her all for Mother, that is Betty’s mission.”

Puck: “My mission is a bit different from Betty’s, but it’s for my cute little sister.”

Asserted Beatrice, and beside her spoke Puck with his unchanging attitude. Hearkening the two’s response, Toska widened his eyes and hung his head down for a bit.

However, his vacillation amounted to only a couple of seconds. With an unbroken sword in his hand, he positioned himself and stood beside Beatrice.

Beatrice: “The opponent is a weyr of one hundred Dragons, I suppose.”

Toska: “If it is my sanity that you’re questioning, then I have been brain-dead after big brother hit me in the head since long before. —It would be unhinged if I were to run away, when I was the one to start this.”

He says quite cool things, Beatrice appended a novel evaluation to Toska’s side profile.

And as though emulating this spirit of Toska’s, Remina and the villagers turned towards the Dragons.

People who had once backed down and renounced resistance, now resolved their determination to oppose their hopeless destiny.

"…"

The humans' unyielding stance made Beatrice strongly, powerfully clench her fist.

It felt mortifying that the only one present here was her impotent self. Had the one here instead of Beatrice been her mother, been the Witch Echidna, then.

Had her likely distant mother, been kind enough to be here, then…

???: "—Al Chario."

Beatrice: "—ah."

A feeble note escaped Beatrice's throat upon hearing the abrupt voice from behind.

The chant had neither been Beatrice's, nor Puck's. It was improbable for it to be Toska, who knew not even the 'm' in 'magic', nor the powerless humans of the village.

That was the chant of one who was au fait with magic, and was utmost informed about it in this world.

As though some dream or illusion, Beatrice turned behind, flustered. The sight reflected within her bluish eyes, the one leisurely ambling toward them was an absolute personage wielding pigment of naught but the dual contrasts of white and black.

—The Witch.

???: "When I returned to the palace, you two were nowhere to be found beyond having left a parting letter, after all. It just so happened that the Dragon of the East was said to have fallen recently, so I was quite worried…"

Beatrice: "Moth, er…"

???: “Your first task seems to have become rather grandiose beyond anticipated. No scope for negligence or interlude.”

Called by Beatrice’s quivering voice, the lady, garbed in black and hair stretching long in white, leisurely halted her gait. Hearing her call, Toska froze, his eyes dilated.

He had knowledge of only one person whom Beatrice referred to as mother.

Toska: “Could it be, you are the Witch of Wisdom-sama…?”

Beatrice: “Yes, yes in fact. Your head is up I suppose, human. Prostrate yourself right this instant…”

???: “Beatrice.”

Beatrice: “Eek!”

Deeming Toska’s bearing as irreverent, Beatrice alerted him whilst correcting her own posture. Her mother’s hand placed atop her slender shoulder, Beatrice bewailed upon her touch.

However, mother—the Witch Echidna faintly loosened her lips,

Echidna: “You persevered well during my absence. However, I cannot close my eyes to that tone.”

Beatrice: “Th-Th-That, was, t-to educate this man, o-on what courtesy is…”

Puck: “Well well, it’s alright, Echidna. You also know Betty’s a hard worker and has no ill will, yeah?”

It was Puck who advocated for the humbled Beatrice, seated on her shoulder other than the one Echidna set her hand onto. A carefree exchange, failing to read the air Toska insisted with a “P-Please wait!”, his voice brimming with fluster.

Toska: “Um! It is a great honor that you came all the way here, Witch-sama! But, the weyr of Dragons is still…”

Beatrice: “…You, what are you acting so frightened for in fact, disgraceful.”

Beatrice glared at Toska as she snuggled with Puck, his form now the original, adorable one, by her cheek. However, he seemed to not comprehend whatsoever, hastily darting his eyes about.

Looking at Beatrice, Puck, and subsequently Echidna, Toska then gulped his saliva and,

Toska: “W-Witch-sama? Um, what does…”

Echidna: “Hm, it’s not anything particularly convoluted. The events transpiring are simple.”

Said Echidna with one eye closed, facing about toward the imminent weyr of Dragons. Lured into her movement, Toska identically viewed the sky, and took notice.

Beatrice and Puck also gazed at the Dragons perfusing the sky, and pitied them.

—Discerning Toska’s brother as a hazard and the stance to resist their downfall was unerring, yet.

Beatrice: “It is your greatest misfortune that you went against Mother, I suppose.”

In Beatrice’s field of vision as she whispered so, the Dragons that perfused the sky finally detected the menace.

However, they wouldn’t make it in time by the time they detected it.

Echidna’s chant, Al Chario set forth its efficacy and destruction manifested in the world.

Al Chario, the force it brought forth was…

Fargall: […Inconceivable.]

The dying Fargall distended its eyes upon the preposterous scene.

Hearing the voice of that Silver Dragon, Echidna raked her fingers through her white hair,

Echidna: “—Should there be any Dragons that survive through those falling stars, I shall listen once again.”

The sky which Dragons reigned, from which far, far higher above, descending from beyond was an onslaught of stardust.

Assailing upon the weyr of Dragons with velocity and might that rendered any defense or evasion impossible, within the destruction kindled by stars they were scorched. Scorched. Scorched.

—This was the true end.

—True ruin brought forth by the absolute personage, the Witch.

7

Echidna: “Going forward, I shall put Carnattse under my supervision. If anyone has any objections, let us have a thorough debate. Should that not suffice, you are free to exercise force.”

Who on earth could defy this ordinance coming from a Witch who had dropped stars.

The weyr of Dragons who had advanced towards Carnattse intending to bring ruin to Toska’s kin—much of the Dragons close to a hundred in totality had fallen, with only four remaining.

One of them being Fargall—injuries healed by Echidna’s hand thus managing to hold onto its life on the brink of perishing, it was the young leader of the weyr of Silver Dragons.

The Dragons who attempted to fight in order to escape downfall exhibited no purpose of resistance before definite ruin, and hanged the heads of their gargantuan bodies low and pledged an oath to Echidna’s words.

Fargall: [—We comply. Dragons born from the eastern sky, shalt not lay a finger upon the redhead’s kin again.]

Echidna: “Eastern sky, huh. I do feel your attitude in surrendering is somewhat unfavorable, but that cannot be helped. On my behalf, I understand… Young man, what shall you do?”

Toska: “M-Me…?”

Asked by Echidna to whom the Dragons submitted, Toska was at a loss for answer.

Making the Dragons surrender was Echidna’s feat, but the one to defeat the mightiest Dragon had unequivocally been him. It seemed that had not fully hit him yet, but…

Beatrice: “Don’t be so stumped, stand upright, in fact. Saving the childhood friend and the village was not your elder brother’s but your own deed, I suppose. Your elder brother was instead the main reason behind this impending ruin, in fact.”

Toska: “—. Beatrice-chan.”

Beatrice: “Why are you saying -chan again I suppose.”

Beatrice violently stepped on Toska’s foot, feeling she was being made light of. Toska howled “That hurt!” upon the affliction, smiling wryly with tears in his eyes.

He subsequently took a deep inhale, slapping his cheeks with his own two hands,

Toska: “Echidna-sama, I hold no objections either. All I did was try saving my childhood friend… Remina. I do not wish for the Dragons to be felled.”

Echidna: “So he says. Rather too kindhearted for the side who was made to confront imminent ruin without any dialogue or discussion, wouldn’t you say?”

Hearing Toska’s reply Echidna gazed at the Dragons, a single eye closed. The survivor Dragons upon receiving that Witch’s gaze bowed to Toska, his expression now altered.

“—I thank thee.”

The Dragons’ brief words, marked an intermission to the havoc enkindled by Dragons that had assailed upon Carnattse.

And…

“—Now then, let us commence the wedding between the village’s hero, Toska, and the one selected by him, Remina!”

“Hurraaaah!!”

With the village headman’s exuberant greeting, the villagers cheered, each holding a cup of wine. And in the core of the whirlpool of thus arising unbridled enthusiasm, stood the dressed up duo of Toska and the young girl.

First and foremost, all dressed up meant was Toska had changed into rough clothes of etiquette, his head now crowned with a festival ornament made out of animal bones. The one truly dolled up was the lovely, sweet young girl beside him, her cheeks slightly tinged—Remina.

Remina, now garbed in a wedding dress, was originally supposed to have lost her life as sacrifice to the Dragon by now. For her fate had been changed, there was no way she had not found happiness.

Beatrice: “How rich, in fact… Won’t go along with humans’ merrymaking, I suppose.”

Puck: “E~h, really? I’m really fond of auspicious atmospheres and seeing people get drunk and be stupid, though.”

Beatrice: “Bubby’s generous outlook is yet far too undoable for Betty, in fact.”

Passing on a slice of meat to Puck atop her shoulder, Beatrice sighed.

The oath pledged between Toska and the Dragons became an ever inviolable covenant with Echidna being its overseer. Thus, Toska had truly become a hero.

And, heroes were rewarded, and the reward he asked for was the young girl beloved to him.

As a result, a celebratory banquet was held and Toska's dearest wish had come true.

Beatrice: "The girl was not against it either, I suppose. It was just his overthinking…"

Viewing everybody's bustling back and forth, Beatrice however did not feel appeased.

Toska having Remina as his bride was a respectable reward. However, the villagers attempted to sacrifice Remina without any attempt for resistance against the Dragon, did they not.

Echidna: "—A rather joyless expression you have there, Beatrice."

Beatrice: "M… Mother…"

Beside the sullen-faced Beatrice, Echidna gently lowered her hips.

Through the course of the feast, there had been an endless number of villagers coming to greet Echidna, who had saved the village in essence. Apprised of words of reverence and gratitude from the villagers, her interactions had now finally arrived at a pause.

Beatrice bit her lips upon Echidna's glance, feeling her innermost heart had been peeked into. However, her mother did not press her further.

In the end, unable to withstand the silence, Beatrice spoke up.

Beatrice: "Betty… thinks nobody except Toska, has the right to be joyful like this, I suppose."

Echidna: "Their village was saved, and they did not have to lose their family or neighbors. You proclaim they don't have the right to celebrate that felicity?"

Beatrice: "Yes, in fact. After all… after all, the one to persevere in the beginning was only Toska, I suppose. Nobody lent an ear to Toska's words. Toska, had no allies, in fact."

Even Toska must not have chosen the Witch all of a sudden among the options he had at first.

He must have scrambled for a way to confront the Dragon in his own way, consulted the villagers, and even considered taking the childhood friend away from the village. The reason why he nonetheless did not abandon the village, was because he was a virtuous human and a coward who could not sacrifice many.

If that coward had brought forth the miracle of protecting what he cherished to the end, then…

Beatrice: "—Miracles, ought to be a reward bestowed upon those who persevered, I suppose."

"…"

It was to Beatrice's whispers, her expression one of vexation, that Echidna faintly widened her eyes. Echidna's rare surprise, eluded notice by Beatrice who glared down to her own hands.

Instead murmured Puck, "Reward for perseverance…" whilst atop her slender shoulder.

Puck: "You sure are kind, Betty. That's why you don't like people who persevered and people who didn't being treated the same way."

Beatrice: "…It might just be pettiness, in fact."

Puck: "Nah, that's not true~. —Besides, Betty's words just now made me feel I've recalled what I need to do too."

Beatrice: "—. Bubby?"

Softly levitating from her shoulder, Puck stretched its tiny build mid-air. Caught into his remark, Beatrice raised her eyes up to the tiny cat, her shoulders slumped.

Upon Beatrice's gaze, Puck laughed whilst caressing his face with a hand, Puck: “Miracles are rewards for those who worked hard… then, I’ve gotta work hard too. My stopover has gone on for a bit too long.”

Beatrice: “Huh, huh, huh?”

Echidna: “—. Are you leaving, Puck?”

Puck and Echidna’s dialogue proceeded, deserting the bewildered Beatrice behind.

Echidna enquired, her eyes straitened, to which Puck nodded with a “Mhm”.

Puck: “I have a mission I was born with. Though that doesn’t go for me alone, mine’s a bit more precise and weighty than others’. I’m leaving in order to fulfill that.”

Echidna: “I see… I shall not impede. However, you mustn’t act contrary to the contract.”

Puck: “Hahaha, that again? Seriously, that’s all you… you guys are all about.”

Laughing like a human, Puck then proceeded to descend before Beatrice. Puck gently brushed the bewildered Beatrice’s nose with his tail.

The sensation swaying her eyelashes, Beatrice vocalized “Bubby…” and called her brother.

Beatrice: “Bubby, you’re going to go away, I suppose?”

Puck: “Mhm, sorry, Betty. I’ll be parting ways for a bit. But, it’s not for always. Once I find what I’m searching for, I’ll come back. Even if I don’t, I’ll look through till every edge of the world then come back.”

Beatrice: “—ah.”

Indifferently informed, the feeling of wanting to stop him clogged up to her throat.

However, Beatrice was identical to Puck, an Artificial Spirit—she could empathize to a painful extent with Puck, who wished to fulfill the mission he was born with. Therefore, she could not stop him.

Born before her, her elder brother in its truest sense. —The only two Artificial Spirits in this world.

Beatrice: "—. Take care of yourself, don't catch a cold, in fact."

Puck: "You're right, I'll be careful I don't throw my blanket off while sleeping. You too Betty, get along and don't quarrel with Mother, okay."

Waving his tiny hand, Puck elevated himself from Beatrice's frontage up toward the night sky. At the same pace, his form as he swayed his lengthy tail proceeded to diminish, before long he was engulfed within the night sky, and disappeared.

In the night embellished with stars, Puck's form was no longer there to be seen.

Although for an instant she anticipated this to be a joke and he would come back down to her, but…

Echidna: "…So he's gone, huh. It was known that this would happen, but how truly unemotional. Must be to a significant extent if I'm the one saying this."

Her mother's words, by her side, repudiated all possibility for this to be a joke.

Ever since she had been born, she had spent greater than half of all these months and years alongside her elder brother. Beatrice's heart was scourged with loneliness, desolateness, that Puck was gone.

Toska: "Huh? Beatrice-chan, where is Puck-sama? Took up any more tasks?"

Abruptly came today's lead actor Toska towards Beatrice, whose eyes were cast down in lonesomeness.

He restlessly surveyed the environs, and touched on Puck's absence with a sense of dissonance.

However, Beatrice firmly shook her head,

Beatrice: “Bubby is gone, I suppose. For his mission, he embarked on a journey.”

Toska: “Embarked on a journey you say, in the midst of this banquet? There’s no way something so bizarre…”

“…”

Toska: “—Is that, true?”

His cheeks tinted in red, likely due to wine, Toska froze and distended his eyes. Beatrice did not refute his doubt. Shoulders ducked inward, she nodded.

Beatrice: “True, I suppose. Well, it cannot be helped, in fact. Bubby has something he must do, and was just on a stopover during his journey, I suppose. So…”

Toska: “Beatrice-chan, are you fine this way?”

Beatrice: “Wh-What do you mean fine, of course Betty is fine in fact. It’s Bubby’s, duty I suppose…”

Toska: “But, your expression really says you’re about to cry…”

With this pointed out to her, Beatrice touched her cheek. Fortunately, no tears had flowed, but this gesture alone made for sufficient basis to legitimize Toska’s words.

Toska: “Echidna-sama! Echidna-sama, did you not stop him?”

Echidna: “He couldn’t have been stopped, you see. Just as this child said, he departed on a journey in order to fulfill his duty. This was a stopover in his journey… the journey’s adjournment and resumption, are all by his volition.”

Toska: “But, Beatrice-chan looked so very lonesome. Because she had been with Puck-sama, she had only barely managed to hang on, so…”

Toska clung to Echidna, delineating as though having surmised Beatrice’s innermost heart and feelings.

To this subject Beatrice reddened her cheeks, and stood up.

Beatrice: “Don’t go on saying things per your own convenience, in fact! Betty is, alright I suppose! Even if Bubby isn’t there… Betty is going strong, in fact.”

Toska: “Beatrice-chan…”

Beatrice: “Bubby left to fulfill his mission… to work hard and persevere, I suppose. He decided to work hard in order to invoke a miracle, in fact. That cannot, be obstructed, I suppose.”

She shall admit it felt lonely. No lies in that.

But, someone else’s heart could not be judged to be chained using one’s own lonesomeness as pretext.

Toska failed to vocalize anything before Beatrice as she averred so, and just looked on at her with eyes abound in compassion. Beatrice attempted to snarl at his gaze right away…

Echidna: “Beatrice, is it true that you feel lonely?”

Beatrice: “Th-That’s… that’s, um, alri…”

Echidna: “—Beatrice.”

The strength she wished to bluff, was whittled with only a call of her name.

Beatrice: “…It feels lonely, in fact. Mother leaves often, I suppose. It would be trouble should something like today happen again, so Betty knows she must guard your absence, in fact. But”

Echidna: “I see, I neglected that on my part. You would feel all the more lonely with Puck gone, huh… If that is the case, then perhaps the timing is quite right.”

Beatrice: “Right timing? Mother, whatever may that mean, I suppose?”

Echidna: “The other day, I found a child suffering from mana periods. Though a human nobility… I wish for him to learn magic. Thereupon, I intended to have him take lessons in the palace until he’s made progress.”

Beatrice was petrified by her mother’s dissonant and, yet again, unconsulted words.

Quite the explosive proposal when she reckoned days of lonesomeness would befall with Puck’s egress.

Mana periods were akin to periods wherein mana that could not be released damaged the body from within.

It was a condition that generally occurred only in demi-humans or Spirits that utilized massive quantities of mana, but the same could rarely occur with humans blessed with potent talent.

Toska: “Thank god. That means Beatrice-chan won’t be alone, isn’t it.”

Beatrice: “Tch, why would you feel relieved, in fact! It has nothing to do with you, I suppose!”

Toska: “No I mean, Puck-sama left for his journey with the impetus of my request and if Beatrice-chan were to become lonely because of that, I wouldn’t know how to hold responsibility for it…”

Beatrice: “Nobody asked you to hold any responsibility, in fact!”

Whether it be about the elder brother or the Dragon, Beatrice was utterly flabbergasted by softhearted Toska’s attitude.

Though it may be precisely because of this tactless honestly of his that he even resolved to fight the Dragon with the sole will to protect his childhood friend…

Beatrice: “Keep this up and you’ll suffer one day, I suppose. Hereafter you’ve got someone to protect, so take proper care of yourself and don’t act rashly, in fact… Betty is, well, she’s alright I suppose.”

Toska: “Beatrice-chan…”

Beatrice: “As much as you can, celebrate your short human life and become happy, in fact. Mother’s benevolence and protection will magnanimously shelter and shield you all going forward as well, I suppose.”

Toska widened his eyes upon Beatrice’s words, then subsequently placed himself into a deep kneel.

The respectful bow, a gesture of gratitude, was directed not toward Echidna but Beatrice.

Beatrice: “Huh… you, that respect belongs to Mother, in fact.”

Toska: “Of course, I am also grateful to Echidna-sama. But, you were so kind as to listen to my request in the beginning, and lent not just your wisdom but even your strength. I, wish to show gratitude to you.”

Beatrice: “…”

Toska: “It is you who is my savior, Beatrice-chan. One day, for certain, I shall repay this debt.”

In face of Toska’s terribly humble statement, befitting of identifying as a pledge, Beatrice turned to her mother, to Echidna in search of an answer.

However, Echidna did not unveil an answer in her intellectual, black eyes. She solely jerked her chin, telling her to face Toska.

Beatrice deliberated much. It would detriment her image both as the Witch Echidna’s daughter and as a Great Spirit to provide an offhand answer here.

Therefore, Beatrice focused her gaze directly into Toska’s blue pupils, Beatrice: “Your vow was certainly heard, I suppose. It shall be placed in some corner of Betty’s mind with no expectations set upon it, in fact. You too, can brace yourself just to that meagre degree, I suppose.”

Toska: “—Understood. But, I will repay the debt I’ve incurred on this day back to you, for certain.”

Beatrice: “You aren’t even trying to get it at all, in fact. This is why humans invite trouble, I suppose.”

So she accepted the youth’s vow, his hair an incandescent red, without ever allowing herself to be honest with herself.

8

—Several days had passed since the Dragon catastrophe of Carnattse and the sudden parting with Puck.

That day, the palace of the Witch of Wisdom, Echidna, for the first time welcomed a human not possessing a wish to be carried to the Witch.

Halting the vehicle pulled by Grim Oxen—Farrow, a vast amount of baggage by his feet, was a seemingly ill-healthy skinny youth, his hair stretching long in navy blue.

Concealing the nervousness of meeting someone for the first time behind a composed visage, Beatrice ascertained the features of the youth who looked toward her that she had been informed of.

Long slitted blue eyes, an orderly countenance. The initial impression of him being ill-healthy did not diminish, but the youth had an expression devoid of anxiety and fear in a world wherein existed extraordinary principles which he set foot upon for the first time. Such was his visage.

And upon noticing Beatrice standing there to receive him in the entry hall, the youth respectfully bowed. The carefully conscious etiquette up until his very fingertips was proof of him having received the finest tutelage.

The youth aimed his blue eyes directly towards Beatrice who perceived this, and,

???: “Today onwards, I shall be under the care of Teacher… Echidna-sama. My name is Altair Mathers. —Pleased to make your acquaintance.”

Naming himself so, he presented a smile with an expression of cheerfulness that looked up towards the hopes of future.

9

Beatrice: “…And so, thus concludes the bittersweet story of Betty and Bubby.”

A hand before her chest, Beatrice marked the cessation to a long, long reminiscence.

From the very beginning till the very end, Ryuzu had been experiencing the joys and sorrows of the story. She put a hand on her mouth and timidly glanced toward the side, seeking an answer to the final twist.

Ryuzu: “Um, Altair-sama would be…”

Roswaal: “Ah, it refers to me. In our house, generation after generation, the head of the household succeeds the name Roswaal. Before I expelled my parents and siblings, my name had been Altair.”

Ryuzu: “A-Ah, I see… Altair-sama…”

Dissonantly divulging his name change, Roswaal made a nostalgic expression. These events must have occurred multiple years ago, as Beatrice then grimaced.

Beatrice: “Infuriatingly enough, he changed his name right after coming to the palace, I suppose. Back then Betty started doubting what kind of a prank it was, in fact.”

Roswaal: “Calling it a prank would be quite the exaggeration. Since back then I had been yearning to be useful to Teacher as soon as possible, you see. That's why it was necessary for me to be in a position where I could freely utilize my house's authority. The name succession came as a result of that."

As one who loved her own, Beatrice could not possibly comprehend being dispassionate regarding one's own name.

Above all, that too was significantly because the one to give her this name had been her godparent, her mother, and she believed the same could be said about Roswaal.

What granted foundation to something's worth, was also significantly because of who it was that had given it.

Just as Beatrice cherished the name given to her by Echidna, Roswaal too surely cherished anything given to him by Echidna without letting go.

Ryuzu: "But, listening to this story, I have grown very much fond of Puck-sama. I would love to meet him once as well."

Beatrice: "Hmhm, that's a matter of course, I suppose. Bubby's cuteness and furriness can't be expressed in words, in fact. Should you actually see him, it'll be life-changing, I suppose."

Ryuzu: "Th-That much so… gulp."

Gulping saliva, Ryuzu nervously imagined the arrival of that time. Watching her spirits, Beatrice pondered she might have uttered something a bit too aggrandized.

The girl, who had been visited by a multitude of misfortunes until reaching Sanctuary due to her bloodline, could not leave this land for now.

Because they were in the midst of constructing and acclimatizing a technique connected with the soil and the inhabitants' blood.

Ryuzu: "You do not need to worry yourself, Beatrice-sama."

Beatrice: "Mgh…"

However, her heart was read by none other than Ryuzu. The girl slowly shook her head, touching her ear slightly lengthier than usual people's,

Ryuzu: "There is much that I do not know or have not seen. So, it makes me happy to be told of so many things by Beatrice-sama like this."

Beatrice: "…Well, then it's fine, in fact. Betty wasn't bothered by that at all, I suppose."

Feeling uneasy, Beatrice averted her gaze. Ryuzu let out a small laugh seeing Beatrice, with the latter miraculously not being displeased by it.

Roswaal: "At any rate, Teacher was magnificent in your story earlier. Who would've thought she would drop stars and repel the weyr of Dragons… it means even the skies abide by Teacher's word."

Beatrice: "Quite the good phrasing in fact, Roswaal. No choice but to compliment you for that one, I suppose."

Roswaal: "In terms of words that extol Teacher, there's no thing that stands equal with me, after all."

Beatrice whirred to Roswaal's phraseology, to which he bowed in a dramatic gesture. Ryuzu watched over the two's exchange with a pleasant smile, when…

Echidna: "—My goodness. I was wondering what it was that you all were talking about."

Beatrice: "Mother!"

Roswaal: "Teacher!"

At the spot where arrangements for supper were being made, Echidna joined them after finishing her business.

The belle Witch with characteristic black outfit and white hair, closed an eye to the gazes of her beloved daughter and her beloved pupil,

Echidna: “Talking about Puck is rather rare… That child doesn’t show himself oft either. I do not believe he perished, but how truly cold-hearted.”

Beatrice: “Bubby must’ve also entered an age where a lot of stuff becomes problematic, in fact. Betty wouldn’t worry about it, I suppose… Putting that aside, it’s time for dinner, in fact! Mother, please have a seat beside Betty, I suppose!”

Roswaal: “No, Teacher, beside me. I had some doubts I wished to ask you regarding Earth IV just about now as well.”

Beatrice: “That’s just an excuse, in fact! To begin with, Mother abandoned writing Earth IV midway through, so even reading it would amount to just feeling unsure, I suppose!”

She snarled at Roswaal, who took out the book and attempted to draw Echidna’s interest with that as pretext. Receiving her words, Roswaal shrugged with a “My, my”,

Roswaal: “You certainly wouldn’t pull such a shambolic stunt when it comes to Teacher at least, yes. If you think it has ended midway through, then doesn’t that mean you simply lack the knowledge to imagine what content would be written afterwards?”

Beatrice: “Galling, in fact. Quite audacious of you to say this before Betty, I suppose!”

Roswaal: “Woah, you wanna go at it?”

Beatrice: “Exactly what Betty wishes, in fact!!”

Leaping over the book’s content, they then jumped to guessing the author, Echidna’s intents. The two’s quarrel subsequently overheated, and the two finally came down to utilizing force.

Away from the bonfire, the two ardently headed toward open ground.

Beatrice and Roswaal’s tussle—it was wholly Beatrice who got heated up, but it was a usual affair for it to aggravate and outburst into a contention of magic.

Ryuzu: “Ah, ah Echidna-sama, what should we do… the hotpot will get cold…”

Echidna: “You seem to be more accommodating than what I anticipated as well. I am relieved. I shall keep an eye on those two.”

Raising her hips which she had just seated, Echidna proceeded to watch over the dispute between the toilsome two. When, Echidna vocalized “That’s right” and halted her steps.

Echidna: “You are having to persist remaining here, but I hope you aren’t facing any inconveniences. Beatrice has become quite attached to you as well. Should there be anything you need I would like to be as open to it as possible, but…”

Ryuzu: “B-By no means. Besides, I enjoy being with Beatrice-sama as well.”

Echidna: “I see. —Ryuzu, please get along with her.”

Upon a rare request coming from Echidna, Ryuzu couldn’t help but be petrified, eyebrows raised. Consequently, Echidna’s figure proceeded to distance away without hearing any answer.

Ryuzu: “Um! Yes, if I suffice! Kindly allow me to get along with her!”

Before her figure subsequently dwindled, Ryuzu cried, erasing her thoughts. Echidna did not halt her gait upon hearing it. She simply waved her hand, slightly.

With the alias Witch came all kinds of hazardous histories and rumors.

But by Ryuzu’ word, who was acquainted with the genuine Witch, a majority of those baseless rumors were false and groundless, there existed only one thing which she could not refute, that too something superficial.

A gauche and kind lady, simply wielding might that transcended human intellect.

Ryuzu: “Both Beatrice-sama and Roswaal-sama love the same person, and yet… although, Roswaal-sama pokes a bit too much fun at Beatrice-sama.”

Even to an outsider’s eye, it was clear as day that Roswaal doted on Beatrice. The reason why this was not conveyed to the pivotal Beatrice was because his way of expressing his love was exceedingly childish.

Roswaal: “—Well well, what’s the matter, Beatrice. Messing about even when Teacher is watching?”

Beatrice: “You! That’s it, you’ve really, really infuriated Betty now, I suppose! Won’t forgive you no matter what, no matter absolutely what in fact!”

She could hear the distant voices of the cordial two, frolicking. Ryuzu’ lips unwittingly gave way to a smile, and reckoned Echidna must have conceived an identical emotion.

The queer relationships of the Sanctuary, relationships that definitely did not comprise family, nor were they not a relationship of benefit.

Though not Roswaal, she wished for bonds not inferior to the elder brother Beatrice had affectionately spoken of to henceforward be nurtured here and tied together.

Whilst musing so, Ryuzu scooped a bite out of the hotpot with a spoon, and tasted the supper.

Ryuzu: “—Mm, delicious as always.”

She was excited to see once the contention of magic came to a halt and the three returned, how they shall all react.

Roswaal, who queerly preferred simple flavors, or Echidna, who did not feel quenched until she had analyzed everything about the particulars of the ingredients used, or Beatrice, who exceeded her bounds and attempted to finish everything served.

Experiencing a multitude of meetings and partings, Beatrice shall certainly prevail alongside the Witch. Ryuzu lovingly surmised about the gallant girl, that happiness lay ahead of that road.

—She prayed, wishing for there to be fortune, felicity upon that road.

Epilogue:
Crying Voice

—For long, for much too long, this expanse teemed with silence.

Everything beyond its time became poison, encompassing even silence. Silence, resounding as a cacophony to ears, was deadly toxic birthed by stagnation eating into the human heart.

Moreover, it steadily, mercilessly and without pardon, ate into even the heart of one not human.

Within the tempestuous silence, faintly reverberated the timbre of grazing paper. Atop her petite lap, turning the pages of a voluminous book, her eyes dimly illumine with a fleeting luminescence, chased the letters in pursuit.

Only the notes of this reprise jolted the air of the library reigned by silence—the Forbidden Archive.

For long, for too long had this evermore, forevermore subsisted—when.

"…"

Long eyelashes laced with her eyelids quivered, her blue eyes were elevated lento. Parting her gaze from the book, her sight focused ahead onto the room's gateway in a long time.

Her focus about concurred with the door unfastening with a creak.

Beatrice: "…A visitor in a long time, in fact. Roswaal too, quite the obstinate chap, I suppose."

Leaking a languorous, enervated whisper, the proprietor of the room—no, the librarian entrusted with this room by its proprietor, received the first visitor to arrive at the Forbidden Archive after a span of ten years with a gelid voice.

In days long, long bygone, she used to await someone's call.

However, her duty had since changed, the librarian's role was to await the visit of the Awaited One.

And, a long time had since elapsed, bearing witness to no visit by the Awaited One.

During this time, a few had succeeded in reaching this Forbidden Archive, but they all were inapposite to be the Awaited One. The same certainly went for this grey-haired grandsire.

Beatrice: "So? What did you come here searching for, in fact. A means to heal all kinds of illnesses? Art of conversation to amplify your fortune and fame? Or truths concealed in history, I suppose. No matter what it is…"

???: "—ebt."

Beatrice: "…What?"

Interposing in the midst of her speech, she failed to grasp the grandsire's scant words. The librarian thus asked again, and the grandsire, taking a step toward her, pierced her with his blue eyes unabating of radiance.

The librarian took an instant and furrowed her brows, gulping a faint inhale. For the possessor of those eyes, was…

???: "I have come, to repay my debt to you. —Beatrice-chan."

Beatrice: "…Toska?"

The librarian whose name was stated—Beatrice, dazed, called the tottering grandsire, the posture of his back bent.

This could not be, she thought. However, no refute was evinced by the grandsire, as he loosened his cheeks into a wry smile like once before. During that journey which lasted shorter than ten days, this was the expression he used to display the most.

Beatrice: "I-Impossible, in fact. After all, it's been more than a hundred years since…!"

Toska: “Erm, yes, that’s correct. This year marks the hundred and fiftieth.”

Beatrice: “You’ve lived for way too long I suppose! B-Befitting of a human, you should’ve celebrated your short life, and…”

Words escaping her, Beatrice was astounded by her own faltering speech. By merely this alone, she had surpassed the number of words she had spoken in the past however many years.

But, that was the scale of her astonishment. —No, her astonishment was illimitable. What did he say, just now?

Beatrice: “Repay, debt…? What in the world, does that…”

Toska: “I heard, you have remained here alone for long. Spending your time in far more solitude, than a bit prior to a hundred years ago.”

By a human’s scale, a calculation error of thirty years is not ‘a bit’, she failed to vocalize even this interjection.

The aged, tottering grandsire lapped with naught of the youth in Beatrice’s recollection, save for his eyes. However, she was astounded by the certitude alone that his eyes had not changed.

Beatrice: “…A hundred years, is not a short period, I suppose.”

Toska: “Of course. I… I, also went through a lot. I had children with Remina, who in turn had their own children, who then also had their own children… living for long is not something that can be overdone. I did not imagine I would live longer than my great-grandchildren. But…”

Then severing his words, Toska took another step walking up to Beatrice.

Toska: “Thanks to that, I made it in time for today… Beatrice-chan, won’t you please leave this place?”

Beatrice: “That’s…”

Toska: “This place, is far too lonesome for you to live in by yourself, all alone.”

Beatrice’s heart was staggeringly swayed, witnessing the wrinkled hand offered before her.

She had deemed her heart as frozen, having decayed the frailty to be swayed due to the stagnation that prevailed for long, but that had been fallacious. Her self was frail, brittle, akin to leaves swaying in nonchalant wind.

Beatrice: “B-Betty will…”

Whispering, Beatrice reached not for the offered hand but below her hip. By the footing of the sitting stepladder, was a single book veiled by her skirt.

Hauling it out in dismay, she ousted the book atop her lap for it and spread it open. Spreading it open, spreading it wide open, frantically attempting to pursue the words that shall hereinafter be inscribed…

“…”

—Before the blank-paged book void of anything ever recorded therein, Beatrice closed her eyes.

Toska: “Beatrice-chan?”

Beatrice: “I cannot, take your hand… no, I will not, in fact. I will not, I suppose.”

Juddering her head, Beatrice rejected Toska’s hand, senescent over a century.

Upon hearing so, Toska widened his eyes. However, his focus immediately rebounded with a “Why”.

Identically valorously as the day he had gripped the sword before the Dragon.

This gallantry of the hero, unchanging despite the elapse of a prolonged period since, seemed dazzling to her.

Beatrice: “Betty, was entrusted this archive by Mother, in fact. This is an exceedingly important, profoundly significant task, I suppose. Betty can never do something, as to abandon it, in fact!”

Toska: “But, it’s already been… it’s already been over a hundred years! Time until someone made children, those children had children, and even their children died! During all this time, you were all alone!”

Beatrice: “This is Betty’s mission, I suppose! Betty’s meaning, for being born in fact!”

Taking another step ahead, Toska attempted to get close to her so that he could reach her hand. Beatrice halted him, with a hand other than the one the book was set atop.

His aged legs paused as though his path was weaved closed, and instead upsurged a wind.

Wind to drive away any parties that threatened the peace of the archive, as the librarian that guarded the Forbidden Archive.

Beatrice: “Return I suppose, Toska. Live your last moments surrounded by your children and grandchildren, in fact.”

Toska: “—Beatrice-chan!”

Beatrice: “…Thank you, for remembering, I suppose. This suffices, as your repayment of the debt.”

Placing a hand other than the one outstretched onto her chest, Beatrice smiled.

Many people apprised her, that she was not honest. Everyone saw through Beatrice’s sighs, but this time alone did she wish to lie convincingly.

In her life of about a hundred and forty years, for the first time, Beatrice wished to be a genius at lying.

"…"

Expelled out of the room, the aged Toska straggled on the hallway, gazing up to the ceiling.

A building precisely identical to the Palace of the Witch he had once seen—however, time had passed, things differed from back then. His self had changed, the world had changed, anything and everything had changed.

Toska: "Yet, you haven't changed at all since then…"

His eyes moistening from vexation, the grandsire clenched the overlong thirst of his cheeks with tears.

How long had it been, since he had cried like this. —Never could he forget. He had previously cried, when he heard of his elder brother's demise. The man who cried not even when he bid farewell to his wife, his children, his grandchildren, now let fall tears.

He could not reach. His self was insufficient. Was he too late. Or, was he too early.

Purely, his self had not been the one. He could not become her, her kind self's, Awaited One.

Toska: "Someone…"

Someone. Anyone. —No, the one who was utmost kind in the entire world.

Someone, please save that kindhearted girl. Please, bury the solitude she had lived.

If this is the Palace of the Witch reconstructed, and if she is the proxy of the Witch, I shall wish until my heart scorches.

Toska: "Someone, please save her… She is, my, savior."

—At the end of his life, the grandsire wept. Wishing for her happiness, he kept crying.

—He kept on crying.

???: “—No good, huh.”

The silhouette watching the grandsire shed tears from the corner of the hallway, sighed so.

One glance at his state was enough to discern his failure. Having hoped that if it’s him, then he might be able to take the girl out of the Forbidden Archive, but it all fell in vain.

???: “Reminiscences dating prior to a hundred and thirty years ago, miiiiight’ve been too slender a thread to rely on.”

Knocking the temple of his forehead with a finger, he recalled the olden, faraway, distant days.

Having swapped bodies thrice now, hence had increased memories he could no longer recollect. However, those days in the Sanctuary shan’t grow dim, never could he forget either his emotions or his regrets.

However, that was his personal circumstance. —He could not possibly let her get involved within, he believed.

???: “But, Beatrice… you will also uphold your promise with Teacher, yes.”

The black books left by the Witch to the two of daughter and pupil—that book which indicated its owner’s future, was the solitary possibility for him, and befittingly his guide to a demonic conclusion.

In order to realize his purpose, it was necessary for him to renounce being human.

Therefore, his self renounced being human, and initiated deeds with the resignation of falling into the pits of hell.

However, at least before that, he wished to keep solely one person, solely her away in safety, but…

???: “Not everything goes well, isn’t it, Teacher. At least… at least, the future that shall fittingly arrive, those final moments, for her to welcome them with full contentment, I pray.”

The Witch who continued to grant the wishes of people, her pupil enunciated a prayer.

Upon the fair cheeks to offer this prayer, his wish trickled down in the shape of a singular warm droplet.

—The grandsire who tied together an old bond, and a kindred soul who relinquished his body to the clownery of fate, shed tears.

Unbeknownst of such happenings beyond the doors closed, Beatrice slowly lowered her hand.

The book atop her knees was an unchanging white, indicating naught of her future.

Beatrice: “…But, one day.”

One day for sure, one day for certain, one day for absolute, will arrive the time letters shall be scrawled upon these blank, white pages.

They whom her mother told her to await, shall arrive seeking the knowledge of the archive entrusted to her by her mother, before the Spirit whose mission was to devote her all for her mother.

Beatrice: “Mother, Bubby, Juice, Toska, Roswaal, Ryuzu…”

Amidst the days she lived for long, she whispered the names possessing magnitude within her heart. Ache constricted her chest upon the whisper of a single name, hugging the girthy black book into the same chest, the girl cast her gaze down.

Someone cool would be nice. Knowledgeable, well educated, elegant in conduct. A master in all kinds of martial arts upon wielding a sword, someone who rumbled heaven and earth upon using magic, it’d be nice if a superhuman like that were to be They.

And, if that was overambitious, then…

Beatrice: “—I’d be happy, if it were to be someone kind, in fact.”

One day, if there were to be someone who opened these doors and took her hand, then she wished for it to be someone kind.

Whilst wishing so, Beatrice faintly wailed, and cried all to herself.

END

Greed IF:
Accumulating Life in Another World From Zero
(Bluray)

Prologue I:
The Shield of the Sanctuary

—Roaring, he swung his claws toward the enemy surging from the environs.

???: “Gaahhhh—!!”

Their soft bodies burst open upon getting ensnared in his claws, his field of vision dyed with blood of a brilliant crimson hue.

The sensation of robbing the life of a living creature, despite being accustomed to it, could have never been enjoyable. Though he felt the hunting instincts seated within him galvanize, it was far from indulgence.

However, he immersed himself during these moments, forgetting said value of life and virtues.

If not, he shall be swallowed by the enemy—no, by the fiendish, multitudinous “Appetite” advancing from every direction, and fail to hold fast to even his own life.

???: “Shiiihk!”

A wrathful bellow, swinging his claws with no set aim, unleashing kicks. He still hit. It hit them. Ahead of his arms, by his shins, rebounded the dull sensation of shattering the bones of a tiny being.

Nauseating. However, forsaking all sentimentality, he bared his fangs in enmity, losing himself.

???: “…”

He was in a wrought state. For as long as time permitted, he had tormented his own body with pain.

Weakness was a sin. His self, had once lost what he held close to his heart due to this sin. Neither was he able to grasp an opportunity to never release what he cherished. That was why, for when an identical opportunity returned, or in order to not lose anything more, he sought the utmost of limits.

He could not, render those days futile. His self, was no longer his weak self. In order to prove that, sojourning an emotion akin to vomiting blood, he smashed, incised, tore apart the tiny lives.

The dusky forest of the night was tainted with blood. He felt the volume of this flowing blood, to be the fruits of the days he had accreted—

???: "—Urgh."

A sharp ache running through, his right calf burst open by scorching heat.

Look there and the fangs of a white ball of fur had been wolfing his leg, severing the flesh with not an instant's worth of vacillation. He gnashed his molars and swung his right arm down like a sword, slaughtering the ball of fur into two slices.

However, he could not end this spar out of agony. In spite of robbing the life of the enemy, he had lost the firm support of his leg. Curtailment of mobility, in this battlefield, meant immediately shortening the distance to Death.

—Death, the instant he focused on that word, shivers ran through his entire frame.

???: "—This ain't, no goddamn joke!!"

He did not want to think of these shivers as fear or dismay.

Raising his voice as though repudiating his weak self and shoving aside the thoughts coming to his mind, he elevated his wounded right leg overhead and energetically pounded it into the ground.

That moment, an immense power was invoked below his feet, and the soil and bare earth were vigorously overturned.

Entire hordes of fluffballs within five meters of his tiptoes were all toppled by the rising ground, many dozens of them giving rise to death wails as their bodies were crushed and perished.

???: “Now—”

???: “—Kyuuuhn.”

However, he was bestowed not even the time to be elated with triumph. Paying no heed to the entombing of dozens of their fellow comrades in the horde, the enemy’s fervor was not withered by even an atom. —No, rather than wither, saying it had augmented would also be appreciable. But, he was unable to identify any change in the horde charging towards his side.

The advancing white fluffballs, felt no rage, turmoil, or anything for that matter toward their comrades’ deaths. With simply a blazing glimmer conceived in their eyes, befitting of fulfilling the desires of the individual, they clattered their fangs.

Clanging, clanking, clunking, clinking, an infinite harmony of the sound of devouring life, abrading his spirit.

???: “—~hk.”

Faintly clearing his throat, he pounded his legs whilst seeking to fall back. What would happen should he fall back now. By falling back, and bracing his stance, just want would that amount to—

???: “—I suppose by now, you must’ve gotten how crazy the enemy is, right, Garfiel.”

Garfiel: “—~hk! Shut yer mouth! Shut the hell up ~hk!”

He reflexively yelled back at the voice abruptly thrown at him from behind.

Lit with the flame of rebelliousness was the fighting spirit momentarily yielding to reason, subsequently repelling the surging vanguard of furballs with a barrage of fists, as by the spray of blood the forest was yet again tinted. Tinted. Tinted—.

???: “That amounts to nothing but buying time. They need to be dealt with from the source.”

Garfiel: “For the last goddamn time, I’m tellin’ ya ta shut the hell up! I ain’t listenin’ to yer directions, ya bastard!”

Upon getting preached by a visage indicating knowledge and experience, he howled back that nobody shall lend their ears to his say. Even should that advice hold accurate, he could never harbor the faith of entrusting his life to the one who offered the advice.

Never could he ever do so, at the very least, for the black haired youth spectating the battle from behind.

Garfiel: “—Piece of shit.”

With the gaze verging onto a sigh at his back, the battle with the white furballs resumed.

What he bore for the onlooker youth standing in the rear was distrust, and a sense of defeat excoriating his chest which he did not wish to admit. The resentment he directed towards his own self for having his state become per the youth’s anticipation, per his words, a maelstrom of rage.

—The crisis imminent upon the Sanctuary, one of the Three Great Witchbeasts, was something beyond what his hands could possibly manage.

Repudiating such seeming folly, he had entered the subjugation paying no heed.

However, the slaves of ceaselessly gushing “Appetite”, their overwhelming numbers and ruthlessness had waged a war of attrition as though sneering at his recklessness.

His wounds were deep. The Divine Protection of Earth Spirits that dwelled within his body accorded strength but could not heal wounds. He possessed no time, to use healing magic. Nor did he possess any comrades who would buy said time, nor did he possess any means to keep the enemy away.

He was alone. He was lonely. And that was something wished for by nobody but him.

That should he alone be strong, he would be able to protect everything till the very end. In order to make that childish illusion into reality, he had continued to train these fangs, these claws, this body.

And yet, and yet, and yet—

???: “It’s beyond you to be able to do everything alone, Garfiel.”

Delegating even the rage to retort with a “Shut up” into his fangs, he smote the enemies before him.

Their soft bodies shattered, flowers of blood blossomed before his eyes. Eating the fluffball now a slice of meat, another fluffball approached. The fluffballs he had assuredly crushed quavered, and multiplied into two like magic.

In an identical vein, the more he crushed the fluffballs, the more they multiplied. No matter how much he abated them, diminished them, they shan’t decrease.

Despair, distended within his chest. It felt as though it was being pronounced for him, that the entirety of the days he had spent until now had been futile, that illusions remained nothing but illusions.

—Warm tears of bitterness cascaded down his eyes, as he pierced them with his quivering fangs, and tore their flesh apart.

Chapter I:
Accumulating Life in Another World from Zero with a Witch

1

???: "—Stay put right here. Do that, 'n I won't be makin' ya suffer."

Dealt by the intemperate voice, Natsuki Subaru realized his error.

Limbs tied, mouth gagged, he was thrown upon the solid, chilly floor.

Having been blindfolded so courteously, he could gather zero information from his vision. However, vision was not necessary for him to know which location in the Sanctuary this was.

For this was not the first time he had been restrained and confined in the ruins in this manner.

Subaru: "~~hk! ~~hk."

Twisting his body, he became desperate to unfasten the constraints on his limbs, but they seemed not to come loose even in the slightest.

On the other hand, he was feeling surprised by the unexpected meticulousness of the offender since it was serving to strangle his own neck. Right now he wished to implore said person to behave more wildly, the way he ordinarily conducted himself.

Anyhow—since things had come down to this, there was not much left Subaru could do.

There was no scenario of him breaking out with his own strength and the pattern of support arriving depends on preparation. And this time, Subaru had not laid the groundwork for said support to arrive.

Thus, Subaru did not possess the means to escape from here.

Subaru: “~~hk! ~~hk.”

However, Subaru had not become so resigned as to give up and think nothing can be done.

Hands tied behind his back, he twisted his body, attempting to sever the rope by rubbing it against the ground. With half hearted resolve, worrying for his own body, making a bunch of scratches was the best he could do.

Had he wielded the guts to whittle down his own flesh, or even his bones, perhaps he would have been able to escape from these constraints.

However—

???: “…”

Atop the floor, as Subaru danced like a caterpillar, the sensation of a tiny hand pin him down.

It was obvious that this was the person who had confined Subaru—Garfiel’s cooperator, and clearly a being exactly identical to Ryuzu.

An existence who could be called, without hesitation, a “duplicate”.

Puppets who took the form of Ryuzu, who simply abided by Garfiel, devoid of any will. It saw to the confined Subaru’s everyday necessities, simultaneously fulfilling the duty of surveilling him.

Even if his constraints were to come loose, then would come the issue of her—no, them? Should he be discovered by them, it would be short lived joy. He would immediately be restrained again, with no hope to escape. Likely, this would happen even if he were to escape the constraints with the resolve to whittle down his own limbs.

—In other words, this conclusion was an inevitable one.

Subaru: “—?”

The time of being given food by a mute duplicate and having his excrements disposed of continued for a number of days.

During meal time, when the gag would be removed, he believed there might be a chance for a counter attack. But that too, was easily restrained by small hands of the duplicate.

In order to escape, he desperately thought up his next plan, when…

—In that moment he began to hear grinding and a dissonance that called out to his instinct.

Subaru: "—~hk."

Guessing the identity of those sounds, anxiety and nervousness sprinted through his entire frame.

That which initially had been few in numbers, gradually built up their numbers and formed hordes, and was drawing near. No point in shrinking himself up and hiding somewhere. Their olfaction—the ability to sniff out the mana stockpiled by living beings was remarkable, and had converged as their singular purpose.

Namely, the purpose of utterly eating away their prey, and satisfying their own "Starvation".

Subaru: "~~hk!"

Limbs bound, blindfolded, and mouth gagged, he crawled on the floor akin to a caterpillar.

Bending his body back and forth, pulling the muscles within his body, unafraid of tearing them, he attempted to run away. Running away, running away, running away, dwelling not on what lies ahead. Simply running away, however—

Subaru: "~~hk, ~~hk?!"

He could not get away at literal crawling speeds.

Caught up by the prancing predators, Subaru's legs were eaten by a scorching like pain. In a matter of mere seconds, he felt the restraints of his legs he had so attempted to escape from come undone, but that gave him no delight.

It was meaningless, since along with the constraints of his legs, all up to Subaru’s knees had also disappeared.

He attempted to screech, but his mouth gag did not permit it. A groan as though vomiting blood in agony, the reason he managed to vocalize that was because the devouring fangs had crunched apart a section of his throat and opened a hole.

It was a shriek lasting but a moment, as soon a tiny creature penetrated into his body from the wound in his throat. One, two, at any rate, an infinite number of them, Natsuki Subaru was devoured from the inside and out.

Couldn’t make it in time, never did any such regrets graze past his mind.

Solely pain. The sense of loss from losing himself dyed his thoughts in murky black.

Die, he will die. If he was going to die, then he wished to die faster. His hands freed, he attempted to kill himself.

His hands were eaten from the fingers. He’s dead. Already, dead dead, dead dead dead dead dead de——His vision cleared, and Natsuki Subaru was standing beneath an open sky.

2

Subaru: “…”

A grassland of verdant emerald stretched as far as the eye could see.

A refreshing breeze jolted the blooms, a calm spectacle contrary to any boisterousness or savagery. The grassland resumed till beyond the horizon, making him almost hallucinate that this tranquility shall persist forever.

Narrowing his eyes from the radiance of this scene, Subaru turned back with a long sigh.

Ahead of his gaze was a slightly elevated hillock. Atop the hillock positioned were a white parasol and a table, seeming to meld into the beautiful ambience of the grassland.

Setting foot on the hillock, he leisurely climbed the slope. Atop the table, whose silhouette gradually defined itself, was a cup of black tea, steam rising from it. The sweet fragrance, mingled in the gentle breeze, was that of the tea and tea cakes that went along with it.

Different tea cakes were arranged for each of his visits. Surprisingly faithful, he thought in admiration.

Though above all, he was aware that both of those things were all make-believe that appeared with a snap of the tea party host's fingers.

Anyhow—

Subaru: "Tch."

Two chairs were placed around the table, both vacant.

Regardless of the invited guest, the absence of the host who invited him had Subaru furrowing his brows as he clicked his tongue whilst guessing what it was that she sought.

Afterwards, he took the cup atop the table in his hand, and bravely carried it to his lips. And, entwining the steaming amber fluid with his tongue, he quickly swallowed it.

Gulping in succession, he drank the cup's content—

Subaru: "—Oe~e~e~egh!!"

???: "Wait wait wait?!"

He vehemently spat out the black tea he just drank on that very spot.

Hot tea dripping from his mouth and nose, Subaru's violent coughs made someone shout with a flustered, overturned voice.

???: "Surely this is quite rude?! To vomit tea someone had prepared for you right there immediately after drinking it, that is too much!"

Subaru: "Cough, cough… s-sorry. It wasn't on purp… oe~e~egh."

???: "Even if not on purpose, it does not make one feel particularly good! To begin with, you need not drink my tea in such a deteriorated condition…"

Subaru: "But, you wouldn't have shown up if I hadn't done that…"

Calming his regurgitation, breaths hoarse, Subaru's words plunged the person into silence. Wiping his mouth and eyes with his sleeve, Subaru viewed the person immediately ahead.

Subaru: "…"

Ahead was a gorgeous young lady, her frame consisting solely of a dichromatic white and black.

White hair as though achromatized of saturation, black eyes as though ensnarling all shadows in the world, and a jet-black dress garbing her slender, supple figure. Proprietor of an appearance that befitted her the description of a belle from the heavens, and also a succubus or a devil—

Subaru: "—Echidna."

Her name called by the feebly breathing Subaru, the young lady—Echidna straitened her eyes.

She knitted her well-defined eyebrows, and slowly shook her head,

Echidna: "It does make me happy that you are so sincerely bearing to fulfill your promise to me, but… Assuming from your state, it appears you died in quite a horrific fashion this time as well."

Subaru: "…I've told you before. There's no such thing as an easy way to die."

Echidna: “I suppose so. That was a verbal gaffe on my part. I do wish to accord with your thinking as much as possible, but… this alone is something I lack personal experience in, you see.”

Subaru: “…”

Subaru grit his teeth, refraining from having a sour expression, to whose words Echidna shrugged and gently caressed Subaru’s back with a hand.

Quite the unusual concern, he reckoned, but being grateful for it, he spoke nothing. Simply resuming his violent coughs for a minute, he remained knelt on the ground until he composed himself.

Some time later, Subaru’s mind and body calmed down at last.

The shock of slaughter from just before somewhat faded, it felt as though Natsuki Subaru’s torn and mutilated soul was returning to its original form.

Albeit he was aware, that this regeneration was nothing more than a patchy, shoddy one.

Subaru: “…Sorry. I’ve finally calmed down.”

Echidna: “Is that so. I am glad. Now then, let me arrange for a second cup of tea…”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “I simply jest, you know. I have received your good faith. Hence, I shall not be insistent. Though this is not really any meaningless entertainment either, you see.”

Halting the hand caressing his spine, Echidna stood up and snapped her fingers.

That very instant, the tea Subaru had violently thrown up, along with the soiled tea cakes and table, all vanished, and entirely new ones reappeared in their stead. As though a dream or illusion—no, in reality, that was the kind of place this was, so these events were truly worthy of being called wondrous.

Echidna: “Now then.”

Echidna then placed her hips on the seat positioned on the other side of the table. Placing both of her elbows atop the table, and propping up her chin, her upturned eyes gave a warm reception to Subaru.

Conjecturing what she sought from her gaze, Subaru sighed.

Subaru: “I know, you don’t need to tell me.”

With that answer, Subaru sat on the chair opposite to the Witch and gazed at the cup of tea which had reappeared just like the tea cakes, and helplessly took it to his lips.

Watching this, Echidna faintly blushed and smiled.

Echidna: “Hm, very well. It makes me happy you have become significantly acquiescent, Natsuki Subaru.”

Subaru: “…Why do you wish to make me drink your bodily fluids this much, wicked Witch.”

Whilst seeing the carefree Echidna’s smile, Subaru distorted his lips, feeling something repugnant instead of the taste of flavorless, odorless tea.

This was a dream world built in the graveyard of her, of the Witch of Greed—the Witch who had already expired took form beyond death, a tea party incapable of existing in reality.

Originally improbable, the solitary space materializing the tryst of the Witch and her contractor.

3

—Subaru was not particularly knowledgeable regarding the Witch of Greed.

Already expired, a young lady who was supposed to have died four hundred years ago. One of the seven Witches possessing immense might, a personage purporting to be the thirst for knowledge incarnate.

All of this was sufficient to raise eyebrows, but Subaru who stood before the genuine entity could not think of any reason to simply laugh it off.

As a matter of fact, the tea party where Subaru and Echidna met was held in her graveyard located inside the Sanctuary, and that she was enjoying this liberty after her death was proof of her might. He had met the other five Witches, but she even had the power to tether the souls of the deceased.

On top of that, there existed no margin of doubt in her being the thirst for knowledge incarnate, a clod of inquisitiveness.

After all, if not so—

Echidna: "—To propose a Contract to you and risk being scowled at by that thing, is not exactly a stunt that can be pulled off, is it?"

Subaru: "…I'm astounded. You're really gonna say that yourself."

Echidna: "It is not anything embarrassing or as such, after all. Rather, in order to have a deeper understanding of you I shall not keep away from all hazards; will this not make for a gallant maidenly appeal?"

Subaru: "It'll just give more of the impression that I've got some crazy person's eyes on me though, you know?"

Hearing the wry faced Subaru's response, Echidna pouted.

A terribly beguiling attitude, but there was nothing dishonest about her say. In truth, what Subaru and Echidna were walking over, was a bridge of risking their lives altogether.

A tightrope walk risking life and death in order to not collide with the outrage of the being who, in some kind, was deemed as the utmost fearsome existence in this world—

Echidna: "You need not be afraid anymore. To the utmost, the Contract is a secret pass tied between me and you. Even should the opponent be a Witch, our surreptitious meeting shall remain unnoticed.”

Subaru: “Can you stop going out of your way and speaking in this suspicious way please? It drains me.”

Echidna: “A girl is going so far as to say all this, and yet you have this attitude, I cannot say I approve of it…”

Echidna implored in displeasure, holding her cup to her mouth. But unfortunately, he had no time to lend an ear to any unserious comments of hers.

This tea party was not an occurrence of reality. Subaru’s body present in this location, Echidna’s existence before his eyes, the tea and tea cakes, from the table to the grassland, it was all make-believe. Outside of the tea party in the graveyard, Natsuki Subaru’s body was still lying on the chilly floor.

Still collapsed by Emilia’s side, who was tormented with nightmares after challenging the Trial.

And—

Subaru: “As long as I don’t find a way to break this deadlock, neither Emilia, nor will anyone else be saved.”

Echidna: “I will say this, you need not fret over the time passed here too much, you know? In accordance with your knowledge, this is a dream world of my creation… self-aware make-believe. Even if you were to spend a hundred years here, merely a scant amount of time would have passed outside.”

Subaru: “You make me shudder. No way in hell I’m spending a hundred years here.”

Echidna: “Oh, how callous. Even when I have already been here for nearly four hundred years.”

Accreting a radical precedent atop a radical proposition, Echidna smiled at Subaru.

It might have been quite an attractive proposal from her perspective, but Subaru's answer earlier was truly genuine. Spending a hundred years here would be outrageous.

—Even if, going forward, Subaru was to spend enough time with Echidna to rival that figure.

Echidna: "—Now then, you do not seem to enjoy small talk with me here anyways, so let us delve into the main issue."

Subaru: "…"

Subaru narrowed his eyes as Echidna set the cup down and clapped her hands before her chest.

Just before Subaru's irritation verged onto its peak, the Witch's observational perceptivity saw through it, making him feel the definite influence of her learning and bittering his mood.

However, Echidna seemed to enjoy even this mental state of Subaru's,

Echidna: "Let me get straight to the point, in what manner did you die this time?"

A candid enquiry devoid of even a speck of considerateness was hurled at him.

Subaru: "…I'm telling you every time, but you've gotta put it in a nicer way."

Echidna: "Oh? Every time? How very intriguing. For in accordance with my cognizance, this is the first time I have asked you this question. If so, can it be inferred that I am receiving identical adjuration from you like this every time?"

Subaru: "That's…"

Echidna: "That's?"

Eyes glistening with inquisitiveness, Echidna reacted with a lean forward. Glaring at her, Subaru fumbled around the bottom of his neck.

And, pulling out a dusky crystal, he forcibly unfastened it from his neck.

Subaru: “Try asking yourself!”

Echidna: “Oop.”

Subaru domineeringly threw the dusky crystal atop the table. Rounding her large eyes, Echidna pleasantly picked it up with a “Let me see let me see” —

Echidna: “Myon myon myon myon myon…”

Touching it by her brows, her lips began to leak this suspicious note of efficacy.

In all honesty, it seemed nothing more than tomfoolery from Subaru’s standpoint. Above all, she would answer that she was being serious upon being questioned.

Subaru: “It’s supposed to be this formula that cannot be omitted in terms of magic, but… I’m goddamn sure that’s all bullshit.”

Echidna: “How upsetting for you to accuse myon myon of being lies, myon. This is a crucial rite, myon.”

Subaru: “You’re speaking your thoughts out loud. Are you really able to read its contents like this.”

Echidna: “Myon myon… do not worry. I can certainly read them. Phrasing it in your style, I suppose it feels like firmly downloading memories.”

Putting forward western words unused in this different world, Echidna ceded the dusky crystal from her forehead. Witnessing the intellectual glister dwelling in her black eyes, Subaru surmised she had attained her objective.

Echidna’s objective—it was to retrieve the memories of Subaru’s previous Return by Death from the crystal dangling down his neck.

That is to say—

Subaru: “In the dusk jewel, the proof of the Contract, accumulated are experiences identical to what all I did.”

Echidna: “And each time you return to the tea party, I succeed the Memories from you. What all you previously conversed with me, and what all experiences you underwent, I mean. Hm…”

Subaru: “What. Is there some defect in the Memories or something?”

Echidna: “No, they are perfect. However, you told me to ask myself, did you not? Once I actually investigate and explore the Memories like this, well well, this is quite astonishing.”

As Subaru sat puzzled, Echidna, smiling faintly, prefaced with a “I mean, is it not true?”,

Echidna: “As much as I could approximately affirm, this is the fifteenth time I have asked you the way you died… in other words, that is the amount of times you have accreted Death since exchanging the Contract with me.”

Articulating so, Echidna returned the dusky crystal atop the table. And, cast her enraptured pupils toward the jewel serving to slake her thirst for knowledge, and her contractor, Subaru.

Echidna: “…Indeed, you are an individual difficult to ever attain. It was correct to have exchanged vows with you.”

Subaru: “Ding dong, you lost points on my amiableness scale once again.”

Echidna: “Hu~h? Even when I am complimenting you, that is strange…”

If that was her way of complimenting, then what Echidna ought to learn foremost was how to communicate with others. Subaru stood in no position to say this about anyone, but he could hold his head high for being far better off than the monochromatic Witch before his eyes.

Subaru: “At the very least, this is no time to be rubbernecking at someone else’s life and death.”

Echidna: “What a mortifying way to put it. By no means am I gaining amusement from the situation of you accreting Death itself. Most of all…”

Subaru: “Most of all what. It’s not too enjoyable of a spectacle anyways or something?”

Echidna: “No, most of all—you and I no longer qualify as being “someone else” pertaining to each other in our relationship, you see.”

Gently tapering her eyelashes, Echidna lowered her pitch to whose words Subaru halted his breath.

Before his eyes, the white haired Witch directed a gaze at Subaru captivating enough to make one shiver, her black irises assuaged with a dubious gleam. Magical charm that made one involuntarily forbear to avert their eyes away from her’s.

His throat feeling parched, Subaru spontaneously gaped his mouth open, focusing on the numbness of his tongue. That was truly an acute manifestation of the sensation of “Enthrallment”.

And much to his vexation, Subaru possessed no means to refute Echidna’s words.

Because—

Echidna: “—You, accepted a Contract with me. A Contract that on your forlorn road of innumerable stumbles hereon, I, the Witch of Greed, shall chaperone you.”

Subaru: “You don’t need to tell me, I…”

Echidna: “Already know, you say? Splendid. Certainly, it seems I have previously had this identical conversation with you before. Mhm, it is present within the Memories as well. However…”

Adjourning her words, Echidna slanted forward.

Subaru was on his chair, petrified like a frog leered by a serpent. Touching Subaru's lips with a finger, Echidna then put her finger on her mouth.

Afterwards, in a beguiling display, Echidna lovingly caressed the finger that had felt his lips with her vermilion tongue.

Echidna: "Once again, this is the first time my present self touches on this topic with you. Therefore, I wish for you to close your eyes to some larks as part of the Contract."

Subaru: "…Should've properly documented the Contract's details, huh."

Echidna: "How unvarnished. But, that is precisely why you attract a special gaze from me. Oop, although what you attract are not my eyes alone…"

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Even I am hurt by an expression so appalled. As a young souled, singular maiden, you see."

Watching Subaru distort his lips, Echidna pouted and narrowed her eyes.

Young souled, this expression alone had plenty of substance to demur, but this conduct of Echidna's vanished her of her earlier bewitching ambience. The Witch showed a multitude of expressions even in this short interval, to opine which amongst those was her true face felt akin to grasping clouds.

—Or perhaps, this enigma too would be unravelled once he had been in fellowship with her for a long, long period.

Subaru: "…The succession of Memories is complete, yeah. Then, let me get to the topic. About this time's cause of death…"

Echidna: "How impetuous. Certainly, it seems you could not see what killed you because you had been blindfolded… but that fashion of death is patent, yes? The calamity that assails onto the Sanctuary, it is the Great Rabbit."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Drawn into the Great Rabbit's foray, your entire body was devoured. To be quite honest, even I felt powerless upon browsing through your Memories, what a miserable Death."

Receiving Echidna's merciless delineation, Subaru felt a gastric influx in his gut once again.

The fierce death that he recalled, it could not have been more than ten minutes since he had experienced it. Unlike how it would have been if he were to be with Emilia or Rem, spending time with Echidna would not heal his wounds.

Even now, the sensation of his defenseless self being gorged away from edges of his body had been incised into his soul with clarity.

Echidna: "It somehow feels like I am being subjected to a rather rude comparison?"

Subaru: "—. Stop with the jokes. You're the type of character who doesn't understand the human heart, aren't you. It's too late for you to be malcontent about however I may think of you in my mind to begin with."

Echidna: "If that is your liberty as an adolescent young man, then I am not opposed to it either."

Subaru attempted to varnish the situation over, feeling as though his mind had been peered into, to which Echidna straitened her eyes. With a single one of her slender fingers, she alluringly traced her body garbed in a black dress.

A devilish gesture suggesting rousing or seducing—

Subaru: "One hundred percent no."

Echidna: "It is quite upsetting to hear you say it with such certainty too~! Despite appearances, I was even said to be welcomed by the king of a country as his favorite mistress."

Subaru: "Well, it's not that king's fault since Emilia-tan wouldn't have been there four hundred years ago.”

Echidna: “You are quite churlish when it comes to me alone!”

Setting her hands on the table, the prior seductive ambience dwindled from Echidna. In all honesty, Echidna pleasantly rattling on would bear to be of greater help to him.

In the sense of ignoring the impact immediately followed by Return by Death or the ache of wounds engraved onto his soul, as well.

Subaru: “Anyhow, I don’t object to the Great Rabbit being the cause of death. But the thing is, that’s the indirect cause of death. The direct cause of death is not the hare, but lies somewhere else. It’s—”

Echidna: “—Garfiel, right?”

Subaru: “…Right.”

Subaru jerked his chin upon Echidna’s brisk, complicit response.

Focusing solely on the main issue and allowing no disruptions during the interlude in between, this Witch was dreadfully concise and brisk.

Testament of her peerless acumen, perspicacity, and most of all, wisdom, but perhaps it was for this reason did their conversations stray off to an infinite extent.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “The reason he perceives me as a hazard is because of the Witch’s scent accumulating due to Return by Death. If it’s always going to be proportional to the count of death, then…”

Echidna: “There exist no means to win the confidence of a being who can pick the scent of Miasma.”

Subaru: “…That’s what I’m worried about. What do you say.”

Pronouncing so, Subaru sought the Witch’s stance on the Witch’s Miasma.

Upon each repetition of Return by Death, Garfiel's attitude quickly altered—now fixed on by utter hostility, the situation was such that he had himself expressed the reason itself.

With the reason for his hostility established, he wished to believe he could change their relationship for the better by removing that facet, but—

Subaru: "Does this scent last permanently upon getting tinged with it? If that's the case, then I'll be causing a good deal of distress to Rem once she's opened her eyes."

Echidna: "Concern that truly befits you, but how about you fear for the nearer future? To begin with, the Oni Clan is a race created such that they are capable of detecting Miasma, so even upon being placed in a distressing plight due to that, I suppose there is no choice but to give up on it by regarding it as an inborn quality of the race."

Subaru: "You said something kinda impossible to overlook, but then that'll mean I'll have to live my whole life with Rem thinking of me as stinky, huh."

Echidna: "Indeed, my deepest condolences… I am joking. Please do not glare at me like that."

Once he glared at Echidna who went astray with unserious answers, the Witch shrugged her shoulders.

Echidna: "Your fear is needless. The Miasma is not overflowing from your own Od. It is but a scent in the end… as time goes on, it will fade and ultimately vanish. Provided it will need copious time for someone tinged to not smell anymore."

Subaru: "Copious time… you aren't exactly talking about a couple of days now are you?"

Echidna: "Considering your density, I would say think of weeks or months. Also, this is something I do not wish to say since you will likely get angry at me, but…"

Subaru: "…I'll get angry if you stop there anyways, so accept it and say it.”

One eye shut, a remark whilst peeking into Subaru’s mood.

Correlative bitterness of not wanting to say because of his foreseeable reaction, but also the inquisitiveness of seeing how Subaru would react.

The idiosyncrasy of the Witch of Greed seemed to be quite the nuisance.

Putting these contemplations of Subaru’s aside, Echidna pointed to the dusky crystal atop the table with a “Well then, allow me to”,

Echidna: “As I previously mentioned, the optimal way of making the Miasma fade is the passage of time. But, since it is simply scent, it is necessary to ward away from the odor’s origin…”

Subaru: “Yeah. So?”

Echidna: “You are my contractor, yes? Even should the Authority not be utilized, you cannot elude my Miasma, so there may never be a day when it fades away.”

Subaru: “In other words, the reason why I stink right now is also because of you…!”

Subaru glanced at his palm once again, eyes dilated. Echidna sulked, stating “That is quite an abashed way to put it”, but this was an unanticipated demerit.

Of course, with him sharing the truth of Return by Death and consulting for a way to abscond from this impasse in their relationship, one could say Echidna was an ally difficult to ever attain.

However, in terms of exclusively the Sanctuary, this relationship’s drawbacks were indisputable.

Subaru: “Echidna’s Contract, and Return by Death’s count… no matter which, if the scent won’t disappear then I’ll never be able to connect with Garfiel. This is pretty bad.”

Echidna: “Certainly, within a restricted span of time, to be shadowed by Garfiel who is far more adroit than you can be called the worst possible environment.”

Subaru: “Sounds so insincere… you better not have known what happens, yeah?”

Echidna: “What do you mean, what happens?”

Echidna tilted her head as Subaru glared at her, teeth gritted in rage. From her black pupils framed with white eyelashes, he could not infer her true motive veiled beneath conundrums. However, it had now already been fifteen times—fifteen times had Subaru accreted Death ever since he contracted with Echidna.

Subaru: “Couldn’t you have given me advice about the problem posed by the Witch’s scent earlier. Had you done that, then Garfiel could’ve been countered while the scent was still weak…”

Echidna: “Ah, so that is what you mean. Certainly, pertaining to the Miasma shrouding you, I could have delineated it at an earlier stage. Regardless, it was still too late. Prior to entering into a Contract with me, you already reeked enough to buy the opponent’s distrust.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “A being who can pick the scent of Miasma surely would not have pardoned you.”

Arms crossed over her chest, Echidna replied whilst intercepting Subaru’s gaze.

Boldly riposted, Subaru failed to immediately refute. Her words could not be fully trusted, but he possessed no basis to allege lies or mendacity.

Once he was told it was too late to do something about his stench, he could not do anything but put his faith in it.

However, amidst an outwardly fruitless exchange, Subaru saw a faint glimmer of hope.

That was—

Subaru: “Considering your fishy phrasing, it seems my guess wasn’t pointless either.”

Echidna: “Fishy… well, I suppose when anyone is pointed out something about a subject as delicate as their body odor, they would feel somewhat discomfited. Most of all, I hardly have any at all. I did not have much body odor when I was alive, and in this place, a dream after my death, I can freely…”

Subaru: “I don’t care if you smell like flowers or sewage. That’s not what I’m talking about. —You’ve been repeating “A being who can pick the scent of Miasma” since earlier, haven’t you?”

Echidna: “…”

Subaru’s identification had Echidna raise a single one of her brows, wordless.

For the Witch to pause and incline herself to listen was somewhat of proof that Subaru was not off the mark.

That as basis, Subaru grazed his jaw with a finger,

Subaru: “An unusual phrase. Of course, here onwards, Return by Death… though I don’t want to rely on it much, but if I’m going to use it then we can’t do away with the problem of me and the scent. So, it’s also possible you may have been looking at it from the perception of someone looking at the distant future, but…”

Echidna: “Hm. That is fine, resume.”

Subaru: “From what you said, our focus to the utmost is the Sanctuary. Yet, why are you using this discursive phrase instead of just saying Garfiel?”

Going further, Echidna had divulged Garfiel’s name itself.

Yet she was expressly drawing a distinction between Garfiel and “A being who can pick the scent of Miasma”.

Its true connotation was—

Echidna: "—You definitely take notice of specifics. Mhm, admirable."

Subaru: "…I knew it, caught red-handed."

Echidna: "Your intuition regarding my fixation was correct, that is all. I certainly was deliberately drawing a distinction between a being who can pick the scent of Miasma and Garfiel. However, is it not a matter of course?"

A faint smile, Echidna resumed with a "After all" whilst setting her elbows on the table, chin propped in her hands,

Echidna: "The Miasma shrouding you, the one who can pick its scent is not Garfiel. It is someone else."

She pleasantly verbalized, unreservedly and lost of any diffidence.

4

Subaru: "…"

Subaru narrowed his eyes in response to what Echidna had said, an air of danger about it.

Deep inside his mind, he felt a certain sort of conviction, like he had muttered the phrase "I knew it".

Echidna: "From the start, I was talking about someone else. So, naturally, I call them differently and differentiate between them. I mean, my thinking here should not be that surprising, no?"

Echidna spoke with an air of composure, like she was talking about the most obvious thing in the world. Subaru frowned in response to her matter-of-fact way of putting it, gawking at her in disbelief.

Subaru: "I'd originally been suspecting that possibility. If he could actually smell the Witch's Lingering Scent, his attitude would've gone to shit right after I Returned by Death and exited the graveyard."

Echidna: “And yet, even when you, drenched in all the more Miasma after returning while accreting so many Deaths, leave the graveyard with your beloved girl, the attitude of Garfiel, who awaits you there, does not change. Meaning…”

Subaru: “Right there and then, he can’t perceive my smell. That’s why his attitude doesn’t change.”

Echidna: “Correct.”

She snapped her fingers and confirmed Subaru’s conclusion.

She was acting like she was his classroom teacher or mentor, but he ignored his irritation towards that currently. Right now, it was more important for Subaru to have his suspicions confirmed.

There was someone out there, separate from Garfiel, who could smell the Witch’s Miasma that Subaru was clad in. In other words, the hostility Garfiel felt towards him was down to this certain someone putting these ideas into his head.

And, he needed not trouble himself over who the candidate for this someone was.

Echidna: “You also must have had an idea all this time, right? Unless you have turned your eyes away from it.”

Subaru: “…Ryuzu-san, for sure.”

Every single time, Echidna’s knack for conversation would come along and block Subaru’s escape. Her skill of forcing Subaru to look ahead was a vector unlike that of Rem’s.

Compared to Rem, she was not as unsparing, but regardless, it was detestable.

Subaru: “Plus, not as kind, the hue’s darker, and it’s bitter in taste…”

Echidna: “I do not suppose I am being badmouthed, am I?”

Ignoring the words of the surprised Echidna, Subaru wrinkled the middle of his forehead.

Thinking about people that were able to smell the Witch's Lingering Scent who would have given Garfiel that information, by process of elimination, it could only have been Ryuzu.

Rem also had that ability, but by now, it was obvious to Subaru that her older sister did not.

In the first place, the allies of Emilia like Ram and Roswaal had no reason to be hostile towards him.

Lastly, to think of the most unexpected, perhaps Otto was somehow able to smell the Witch's Lingering Scent, but—

Subaru: "…He was killed right in front of my very eyes."

Just by recalling it, it became hard to breathe, but Otto had been an absolute idiot that had thrown his own life away for Subaru, someone he had known for such a short period of time. Therefore, he was most definitely not the mastermind behind this.

Subaru: "Now that I think about it, I was held captive by Ryuzu-san and Garfiel in the past."

That had been a collaborative effort of the both of them, but he had thought the main offender had been Garfiel. He had been mistaken. —The main offender had been Ryuzu, and Garfiel was only a collaborator.

And, the reason Ryuzu took these actions was—

Subaru: "Because she smelled the Witch's Lingering Scent."

Echidna: "She tattled that to Garfiel, whom she trusts. Believing his grandma's words in a heartbeat, Garfiel's behavior instantaneously changed, and he bared his fangs at you. Quite literally∼."

Subaru: "…"

While wagging her finger, Echidna confirmed Subaru's deduction.

With that explanation, the storm whirling inside Subaru had dissipated. But, without giving him a pause, black clouds began to appear inside his heart once more. Making their way through to his expression, Echidna tilted her head with an “Oh”

Echidna: “Your expression is quite stressed, perhaps there is something you wish to say to me?”

Subaru: “Of course there is! From how you talked earlier, you knew my real enemy was Ryuzu-san this entire time, didn’t you! And yet…”

Echidna: “Why did I not say anything, huh. It is reasonable that you would get angry, but for what it is worth, I had a reason. I do not think it is too late for me to say it?”

Subaru: “—Tsk, what is it?”

Echidna’s finger brushed against Subaru’s forehead as he gritted his teeth. Subaru took a listening posture, though his vigor was not dampened by the touch of the slender finger.

With her finger still pressed to Subaru’s forehead, Echidna prefaced her question with “Listen?”,

Echidna: “I mentioned earlier the problem with the Miasma surrounding you, did I not? As long as you have a Contract with me, the Miasma will never fade from you. Every time you use your Authority, the Miasma grows stronger and stronger, and it becomes impossible to make up for the impression you make on them.”

Subaru: “…Ah, about that huh. What does that have to do with you not telling me anything?”

Echidna: “You are quite impatient. In other words, no matter what I said, their impression of you would not change… I want you to understand that it is a given.”

While roundabout, this was her crude explanation to justify her decision.

Even so, while her finger was still pressed to his forehead, without saying anything, Subaru urged Echidna to continue. If she kept spitting excuses, he might have changed the way he viewed his Contract with her.

Echidna: “—That, is extremely unsatisfactory for me.”

Echidna replied to his innermost thoughts, prompting Subaru to raise his eyebrows.

Smiling at Subaru’s reaction, Echidna shrugged while saying “It’s not a complicated matter”.

Echidna: “As a basic premise, the other party… For convenience, let us call them Ryuzu. That negative impression you left cannot be changed. As such, If she remains your enemy, Garfiel’s aggression cannot be avoided… are we clear on that?”

Subaru: “…Continue.”

Echidna: “On the other hand… if Ryuzu was no longer your enemy, Garfiel’s aggression towards you would no longer be an issue, that is what I am saying.”

Echidna briefly summarized the problem as if she were stating a simple theory.

Surely, Echidna was correct on a logical level. Since Ryuzu was the one who had sensed the Witch’s Lingering Scent, if her meddling was the reason for Garfiel’s hostility towards Subaru, then logically the best way to avoid that confrontation within the Sanctuary would be for Ryuzu to not recognize Subaru as an enemy—

Subaru: “However, understanding the reasons behind their actions won’t change the outcome. In your own words, the Witch’s Miasma has drenched me with no hope of it fading away. If that’s the case, the reason for being hated won’t go away either…”

Echidna: “That is true. You still will be hated… Even so, that is no reason to be hostile.”

Subaru: “Huh?”

After those words that destroyed his previous assumptions, Echidna moved her finger away from the surprised Subaru's forehead and snapped her fingers right before Subaru's nose.

Suddenly, a white cup appeared on the cleared table, and the aroma and steam wafted into his nostrils.

It was the tea set that was served hospitably to Subaru every time he returned to the Castle of Dreams—the "Dona Tea".

Subaru: "…The hell are you doing?"

Echidna: "Have I not told you? I do not just serve tea frivolously, nor am I asking you to sit at the table just a matter of formality."

Subaru: "I thought it was just your fetish to make me drink your bodily fluids…"

Echidna: "Actually, while I do not mind seeing you drink my tea so reluctantly, that is not what I meant. Before entering your Contract with me, you had talked to Ryuzu. —About the Apostles."

—Subaru's breath stopped at the mention of the word "Apostles", causing Echidna's black pupils to flicker.

Echidna's assumption was correct that he had heard that word, before he had entered the Contract with her, before he had experienced Death fifteen times.

When the Witch of Envy had covered the Sanctuary in her shadow, and when Subaru had seized the opportunity to commit suicide through Echidna's scheme, he had seen numerous Ryuzus—her replicants, including Garfiel, who was accompanying them.

After that, Subaru had learned about the origin of these replicants, "Ryuzu Meyer", and that the Ryuzu he knew was a clone of her, a part of the system that protected the Sanctuary.

Apostle, it was a word he had heard in a conversation with Ryuzu at that time.

Echidna: "Do you remember? I believe Ryuzu had told you. The tea that has been served to you…”

Subaru: “Something about it giving me the qualifications to become an Apostle of Greed.”

Echidna: “And, that Garfiel also gained power over the replicants under the same conditions.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna’s additional words fit together perfectly within Subaru’s mind.

With a click, the gears began to turn, and Subaru felt like he understood the Witch’s aim, along with the words she had added. The tea was something that gave Subaru power as an Apostle of Greed.

There might have been many other tricks up her sleeve, but for now, he would turn a blind eye to them. The important thing here was that fact, that Echidna had overlooked Subaru’s Deaths fifteen times.

What was the reason that Subaru had to stack up more than fifteen Deaths?

It was—

Subaru: “—I’m waiting for my power over Ryuzu-san and the other replicants to surpass that of Garfiel’s.”

Echidna: “That is a great answer.”

Echidna clasped her hands in front of her chest and raised her voice cheerfully.

Echidna: “If two Apostles exist, then it would be natural to conclude that the one with the higher affinity would have priority when giving orders. It has been ten years since Garfiel challenged the tomb and became an apostle… So it is not surprising that he had plenty of experiences of being an Apostle. If you were to try to compete with him in such a short amount of time…”

Subaru: “Then it would be best for me to drink the tea over and over again… but what’s the point?”

Echidna: “Oh, are you concerned about what will happen after Death? Have no fear, since you are contracted with me, my interference will accumulate in your soul. It cannot be left behind when you cross over into Death.”

Subaru: “…You didn’t tell me this before, that way I wouldn’t lose my motivation.”

Before Subaru’s eyes, as he mumbled in frustration, Echidna hugged her elbows in silence. A faint smile appeared on her lips, quietly confirming Subaru’s words.

During the fifteen Deaths that Subaru had experienced, Echidna had hidden the truth about the relationship between Garfiel and the Ryuzus. The reason was that there was no solution for dealing with them until the effects of the tea had taken hold.

—In short, Subaru had no other solution but to accrete Deaths.

Echidna: “Now that you understand, are you convinced?”

Furrowing her brows, Echidna peered into Subaru’s face as he bit his lip.

The act of her slightly lowering her tone and giving an upward glance towards Subaru caused a burst of rage to swell up inside of him, but he refrained himself from raising his voice. In fact, Echidna’s thoughts were accurate.

—He would not have easily agreed to something as ludicrous as sacrificing himself fifteen times for nothing.

Subaru: “You needed me to understand that it was a dead-end, and there was nothing I could do.”

Echidna: “Yes yes, that is correct. I knew you would understand.”

Subaru: “Ding ding ding, your amiableness score has gone down once again.”

Echidna: “Heeh?”

Echidna’s eyes widened at Subaru’s heartless announcement. Subaru finished another cup of tea on the table in one gulp, relishing the Witch’s reaction.

Despite the steam rising from the cup, he felt no heat. It was an odorless and tasteless tea of unknown ingredients.

It was surprising that the Witch’s scheming included such a bland tea, and even more so that it would help to conquer the Sanctuary.

Indeed, there had been no wasted actions. Not the fifteen Deaths he had accumulated, nor even this Tea Party where she had revealed her true intentions.

Subaru: “So, the secret has been revealed. Which would mean, the time has come… hasn’t it?”

Echidna: “Indeed. It seems as though you now rank higher than Garfiel as an Apostle. The replicants that shield the Sanctuary cannot resist your commands. Even Garfiel can no longer give them freedom.”

Subaru: “…”

Subaru could not help but notice the irony of him being called “The Shield of the Sanctuary”.

Originally, Garfiel had appointed himself to that role. However, Echidna, who had created the Sanctuary, recognized Ryuzu as the Shield rather than him.

As proof of this, Garfiel would be left out in the dark.

Subaru: “The Witch’s Lingering Scent… if Ryuzu-san doesn’t tell Garfiel about the Witch’s Miasma, he won’t have any reason to oppose us.”

Echidna: “Even so, he would not essentially want the Sanctuary to be released.”

Subaru: "…If there's room for discussion, there's a way to handle it."

The biggest problem with Ryuzu's inclusion was that it took away the possibility of discussing things with Garfiel.

If only he did not resort to violence and confinement first, then perhaps they could do something.

Perhaps, they could even give Garfiel a decisive reason to leave the Sanctuary.

For that purpose—

Echidna: "—You have keen eyes. Even I, a Witch, shudder at the thought."

As if reading Subaru's thoughts, Echidna chuckled and picked up a crystal off the table with her slender white fingers—picking up the Magic Crystal, she offered it to Subaru.

She did not want to miss a single fragment of Subaru's experience as her contractor.

Echidna: "Now then, things are in order. And moreover, the chances we have are now endless. With the Authority you possess, let us repeat every single kind of experience, over and over and over again, —let us seize that world which you desire."

With that, the Witch of Greed mercilessly pushed Natsuki Subaru toward his hesitance.

5

—Frustratingly, the situation went smoothly, all according to Echidna's plan.

???: "I am Ryuzu Shima… one of the first four replicants of Ryuzu Meyer, and a failure who had her role taken away."

In the forest, dressed in white and hiding in the woods, Ryuzu—no, Shima said so, raising both of her hands up in resignation at Subaru, who had found her.

Finding her was easy. He had simply gathered the replicants, distributed them throughout the Sanctuary with Pico as their leader, and gave them an order.

—He had instructed them to find the replicants who had been secretly meeting with Garfiel.

And, the Eyes of the Sanctuary, which Garfiel boasted about, found their target easily and told Subaru of her location.

Subaru: "Shima… the Ryuzu-san I know called herself "Ryuzu Bilma". That difference, does it mean that you distinguish each other by your surnames?"

Shima: "…"

Subaru: "Answer me."

Shima: "—. Yes. We are all descended from Ryuzu Meyer. Thus, we cannot change the fact that we are Ryuzu. So, we sought individuality in another aspect."

Shima, who had remained silent for a moment, answered Subaru's question.

Forcing her to answer, despite her emotional state, seemed to be a privilege given to those who were deemed Apostles of Greed. The privilege of commanding the replicants, that was what had coerced Shima to speak.

Subaru: "Ryuzu-san… no, I'll call you Shima-san, I'm sure you're sensing the Miasma that seems to cloak me, right?"

Shima: "Hm…"

Subaru: "Please, don't try to fool me. I don't want to force you to answer me truthfully every time I ask you something. It hurts my heart to do so to such a familiar face."

Subaru pleaded with Shima, who hesitated to answer.

It might not have been entirely accurate to say that Shima was a “familiar face”; however, she was the spitting image of the other Ryuzu that Subaru was acquainted with—Ryuzu Bilma.

Forcing someone to bend to one’s will and twisting their true intentions would not be a good feeling. That method would be no different from brainwashing or blackmailing with how despicable it was.

Shima: “…That’s true.”

Perhaps sensing his distress, Shima silently nodded her head in agreement.

So finally, one burden was lifted from Subaru’s shoulders. —He felt that there was a glimmer of hope in dealing with Garfiel, a situation which had not progressed for a long time.

Subaru: “Shima-san, were you planning to meet up with Garfiel later to convey this information to him? Could you not do that, please? I don’t want to aggravate our relationship.”

Shima: “…Even if you say that, if Gar-bo pesters me, I won’t be able to go against him.”

Subaru: “Is that really the case? —Even if it is my request?”

Shima: “—Hk!”

In response to Subaru’s repeated question, Shima’s previously shrewd and relaxed expression stiffened for the first time.

Or, perhaps the calmness that had prevailed until just before was due to resignation. As such, Subaru’s words directly interfered with Shima’s calm, ocean-like state of mind.

Shima: “Could it be, Su-bo, that in just half a day, you’ve become an Apostle of Greed…?”

Subaru: “If the question is something like “Have you been awakened?”, the answer is an unwilling yes. Can you really bring yourself to lie to Garfiel through the persuasive power of my words?”

Shima: “…Probably, I’m sure there wouldn’t be a problem.”

With her eyes downcast, Shima reluctantly nodded to Subaru’s question.

Her reaction simultaneously brought a sense of relief that it had gone well, and a sense of guilt that he had pushed her too hard into this position. It was truly bitter and left a bad aftertaste in Subaru’s mouth, like an act of self-harm that he had inflicted on himself.

However, the only real harm that had been done was to Subaru. —He gritted his teeth and looked forward.

Subaru: “Pico, come here.”

Closing his eyes tightly, Subaru killed his hesitation and called out behind him.

Then, a silent Ryuzu emerged from the bushes—one of the replicants. Of those scattered throughout the Sanctuary, she was also a hollow-like marionette with no purpose but to listen to instructions.

Information within the Sanctuary could also be obtained from replicants other than Pico. If Shima was not an enemy, this analog surveillance system could be extremely useful.

Subaru: “If Shima-san doesn’t provoke him, there’s no need to worry about Garfiel’s sudden outbursts. However, I’ll have a few of you take turns keeping an eye on him.”

Shima: “Su-bo, about Gar-bo…”

Subaru: “—He’s currently my number one potential enemy right now.”

Subaru gave Pico instructions, interrupted Shima, who was about to say something, and explained to her clearly.

Shima snickered at his decisiveness, but Subaru’s greatest sincerity was his honesty.

Of course, Shima had her own point of view. Subaru, too, had experienced Death nearly twenty times so far, and had interacted with Garfiel in the Sanctuary.

According to that experience, Subaru knew that Garfiel was not an incomprehensible monster. He understood that much.

However, even so—

Subaru: "—I've already made my decision on what should be prioritized. Don't get it wrong."

Under Subaru's firm gaze, Shima shut her mouth and turned her head away.

Subaru did not command her to be quiet or to disobey. It was just that she was painfully aware of the firmness of Subaru's determination.

In Subaru's mind, the words of someone, not of Shima who stood before him, not of Garfiel who opposed him, not of the Witch with whom he was cooperating, but of another person, resurfaced.

Those, were the words spoken by a terrifying man who sneered in a world painted with blood, adorned with white snow and flames.

A man who had even used his own life as a betting chip and had left a curse on Subaru.

???: "Liiisten~ well, Subaru-kun. —This is important. The one thing that is truly, truly important to you. Cast away everything else except that one thing. Let go of everything else except that single thing, and think only of protecting your single most important thing to the end. If you do that—"

Subaru: "—You too, can become like me."

Subaru: "I—hk!!"

As soon as the voice echoed clearly in his head, his throat trembled with anger.

His vision turned red, and the beating of his heart sounded incredibly loud. His breathing became ragged, and Subaru could no longer bear it, slamming his fist hard against a tree trunk.

Shima: “S-Su-bo…?”

Suddenly Subaru erupted into a tantrum, and Shima timidly called out to him in a frightened tone of voice.

The frightened tone of Shima’s voice reminded Subaru of his instability, and he replied “My bad…” with a hand to his forehead.

The contents of his skull throbbed painfully, as if the pain was a reminder of a nightmare that he should not forget. —No, he must not forget it.

That was a warning. That curse was a binding chain that Subaru himself must consciously bear.

Subaru: “…Don’t get me wrong, Shima-san. It’s true that I consider Garfiel as a potential enemy, but I’m not thinking of getting rid of him in any way.”

With a frown on his face from the headache, Subaru said this to alleviate Shima’s concerns. Shima’s eyes widened at his words and she leaned forward, asking, “Ho, is that true?”

In response, Subaru nodded his head and said “Yeah”,

Subaru: “However, I need Shima-san’s cooperation to get him away from here peacefully. It’s going to take a lot of work to convince him. Shima-san understands that too, don’t you?”

Shima: “That’s… because Gar-bo’s stubbornness is hardwired. But how?”

Upon hearing that he wanted a peaceful resolution, Shima also agreed with Subaru’s thinking. Subaru accepted it affirmatively and moistened his lips with his tongue.

He was not plotting, nor was he camouflaging about his true feelings. Sincerely, he wanted to convey with all his words, so that they would understand.

And, if possible, to achieve a satisfactory conclusion for everyone involved in this situation.

By doing so, he could prove himself. —Once Natsuki Subaru accreted it all.

Subaru: "—Roswaal, I am not like you."

He would never become the Warlock, who was obsessed with just one thing, and allowed the world to make everything a sacrifice.

Even if he were to take the hand of the Witch, he would not lose the soul and dignity of being "human".

That was why—

Subaru: "—I, won't become like you."

6

It was with the cooperation of Ryuzu Shima and the twenty-one replicas who followed his instructions.

By using the power as an Apostle of Greed and skillfully manipulating them, the situation that should have been intricate was easily untangled, like light shining from beyond the dark clouds.

For Subaru, who felt as if his head was being held down and submerged in water, it was a level of emotion akin to finally taking in a breath of air.

However—

???: "Gaahhhh—!!"

And, with a blood-curdling scream, claws were swung and lives were cruelly torn apart, a scene that was contrary to the divine radiance that shone from beyond the dark clouds.

Subaru: "…"

Before the eyes of Subaru, with his arms crossed, there was a small shadow that was striking to the left and right.

Fighting against the overwhelming white malevolence that approached like a surging mist, literally, was a figure of a golden-haired boy—the heroic figure of Garfiel Tinsel.

Garfiel: "Shiiihk!"

Roaring ferociously, slashing with claws and fangs, he destroyed the enemies that came at him from all directions, one after another.

—His figure, what else could one call it other than heroic?

Facing the enemy without the support of his allies and standing in isolation, Garfiel proved that he was a bold fighter as he mustered all the courage he had built up in his body.

His posture engraved his nobility and bravery more eloquently than words ever could.

In fact, Subaru had no choice but to honestly re-evaluate the fact that he, too, had underestimated Garfiel.

However—

Garfiel: "—Urgh."

Garfiel's throat groaned in agony as a fang was plunged into his right calf.

The embodiment of gluttony devoured the muscles of his well-trained leg in one gulp, aiming to fill its stomach. Its round body was torn in half by a descending karate chop.

However, taking the opponent's life was not enough to make up for the pain.

There were literally enough opponents to fill Garfiel's field of vision.

Garfiel: "—This ain't, no goddamn joke!!"

For a brief moment, a hint of weakness flickered in his emerald eyes, but it quickly faded away.

Biting back the weakness that had sprouted within himself, as if he was ashamed, the roaring Garfiel swung his blood-spurting leg and smashed it powerfully onto the ground.

Immediately after, the trampled earth burst forth, and the destruction swallowed up the white herd of animals.

Collectively, dozens of them—no wonder they were frightened and realized their disadvantage, even if they were Witchbeasts.

Garfiel: "Now—"

Naturally, Garfiel, seeing this, also snapped his fangs in response to the blow.

It was a result worth being proud of. Or perhaps. he might have felt a tailwind at his back, almost like a plea, that he would be able to repel the enemy. —But all of that, too, was just a trick.

Great Rabbit: "—Kyuuuhn."

Stepping over the corpses of their own kind that were killed by Garfiel, the swamp of white furballs stirred.

All at once, without stagnation, like waves on the shore, the Witchbeasts approached like a surging wave. In an unchanged manner, with the deafening cry of kichi kichi.

There was no sense of fear for the death of their kind, or for Garfiel who made it happen.

Kichi, kichi, kichi; a quiet and cruel, life-devouring sound—.

Garfiel: "…"

Before that demeanor, even Garfiel's profile showed a frightened expression.

None could point a finger at him and demeaningly ask where that gorgeous figure from just before had gone. This was not the level of disaster that could be faced with a sound mind.

He thought this was the moment.

He had been waiting for the right timing to interject, to seize the opportunity to extend a helping hand, and he believed this was it.

Subaru: "—I suppose by now, you must've gotten how crazy the enemy is, right, Garfiel."

Garfiel: "—~hk! Shut yer mouth! Shut the hell up ~hk!"

However, Garfiel shouted at Subaru as if shaking him off

It was a voice that rejected Subaru, even more than it refused to admit his own fright.

In front of Subaru, whose eyes were wide open in the face of a backlash beyond his imagination, Garfiel's fists roused his deflated heart, and seized the white ball of fur—the Great Rabbit, and crushed the small Witchbeast.

The barrage of fists that were continuously unleashed blew away the fragile Witchbeasts with each blow, but those that turned over and stopped from moving were mercilessly chewed up by the fangs of their own kind that followed, like a perpetual motion machine.

—No, perhaps it would be more appropriate to say that they were not exactly members of the same herd, but more like they were the same existence.

The Great Rabbit, after all, was a being of mysterious biology that trembled and divided itself in the blink of an eye. Whether this was cell division or replication of itself was not clear.

The only thing that could be said was—

Subaru: “That amounts to nothing but buying time. They need to be dealt with from the source.”

Garfiel: “For the last goddamn time, I’m tellin’ ya ta shut the hell up! I ain’t listenin’ to yer directions, ya bastard!”

Being told directly that he would not be heard, Subaru could only curl his lips.

But, it would be arrogant to just assume that Garfiel’s stubbornness was simply stubbornness.

In the first place, looking back on how he had to face one of the Three Great Witchbeats, it was clear that anyone would sympathize with Garfiel as he faced the Great Rabbit.

Subaru himself realized that this was a terribly malicious method that he had used to set this up.

Garfiel: “—Piece of shit.”

As if encouraging himself, or hating the world, or cursing Subaru behind him, abusive words leaked from Garfiel’s mouth.

It was natural for him to want to shout like that. Garfiel’s feelings could be easily understood, as one were holding them in their hands.

Subaru, too, was dizzyingly familiar with the feeling of helplessness that burned in his chest.

Caught between feelings of powerlessness and disappointment, that was the terrifying nature of the hell that was oneself.

At first glance, Garfiel appeared to be furious, but in reality, to Subaru, he looked like he was crying. Overwhelmed by his own sense of powerlessness and disappointment with reality, he was like a crying child.

And, it was the scheme of none other than Natsuki Subaru that made him realize this.

Subaru: “It’s beyond you to be able to do everything alone, Garfiel.”

This was not something that was limited to Garfiel personally.

It was known that in all kinds of hardships, the power of a single person was tiny. That was why, to resist the raging current of fate, even giving it one’s all was not enough.

At least, it was not something that could be changed with just one person’s life.

Garfiel: “…”

Before Subaru’s eyes, Garfiel’s valiant struggle continued to be in vain.

Even if he shook off their claws and fangs and spilled their blood and flesh, the large rabbits’ numbers were replenished immediately. It was not a game of cat and mouse; it was an overwhelmingly one-sided battle of endurance.

Only his durability was being tested, and the enemy’s side was not running out of gas..

That was why they were called the Three Great Witchbeasts, and continued to threaten the world endlessly.

Subaru: “—This is the end.”

Tears streamed down Garfiel’s face as he grit his teeth, and his body was covered in incurable wounds.

If he took a moment to catch his breath, it seemed he would have been able to heal his wounds with the healing magic he had learned. But, he could not make the time for that. He should have felt the pain of knowing that he could not do it alone.

To make him realize that, he took him to the Great Rabbit that was assailing the Sanctuary.

With that goal accomplished, Subaru gave instructions for a replica to act as a bait for their retreat.

Subaru: “They’re coming straight towards the Sanctuary. It seems like the people in the village are a feast for them. So, we have to evacuate them.”

Garfiel: “…”

Subaru: “This isn’t the time to argue about whether or not to open the barrier of the Sanctuary. You understand how serious this is, right?”

Faced with Subaru’s question, Garfiel sat on the ground with his legs outstretched in front of him.

His back was pressed against a large tree and his face was downcast. He was conscious. He was also listening. That was evident from his trembling ears and occasional reactions in his breathing.

However, he probably did not have the capacity to respond to Subaru’s words. That was understandable.

He must have felt helpless against the Great Rabbit, and he must have felt like he had been denied the days he had spent accumulating.

Subaru, who had set up this outcome, did not feel great either. He did not even have a sense of accomplishment for being able to manipulate his opponent according to his expectations.

There was only a sense of exhaustion, and a dim expectation that things might work out. This expectation was neck and neck with the anxiety that things might not work out.

Garfiel: “…What ’bout Granny?”

Subaru: “Ryuzu… Shima-san is waiting in the Sanctuary. Originally, I didn’t plan to take Shima-san and the others out in front of the Great Rabbit. But I had Pico and the others push themselves to do it.”

Garfiel: “Pico?”

Subaru: “One of the ones who look exactly like Ryuzu-san and Shima-san, except for the fact that she’s not them.”

Garfiel wrinkled his nose in displeasure at Subaru’s answer.

Subaru somewhat understood why Garfiel had that reaction. Garfiel probably wanted to distinguish between Ryuzu-san and the others.

The grandmother, whom he loved, from the replicas, who were just identical dolls.

Maybe Garfiel was more rational in his approach to the replicas. Subaru would not have named her Pico if he had known how the replicas worked.

But, he had already given her that name. Subaru could not change it now.

Subaru: “Even so, I had to borrow their strength to bring you out and to attract the Great Rabbit… However, it seems that even if we delay their advance, we cannot change their course.”

Garfiel: “Ain’t gonna know unless ya give it a shot, ya know…”

Subaru: “No, I do know. —I’ve tried it many times already.”

Garfiel: “What…?”

Garfiel cleared his throat, dissatisfied when he could not understand what he meant.

However, Subaru did not intend to answer his question in detail. He only used the fact that his answer was not a bluff or anything of the sort as the basis.

The Great Rabbit’s course could not be changed. They were heading straight for the Sanctuary.

Therefore—

Subaru: “Evacuate the residents of the Sanctuary. Everyone in Arlam Village, too. I don’t want you to get in the way of that. That’s why I warned you about the crisis.”

Garfiel: “—. I get that we can’t do shit ’bout ta Great Rabbit. But, what’cha gonna do ’bout it?”

Subaru: “What do we do?”

Garfiel: “It’s obvious! The barrier! As long as the barrier’s up, no one ‘cept my amazin’ self can leave the Sanctuary! Not ’til that princess smashes through the Trial…”

The residents of the Sanctuary could not escape the forest because their souls would be repelled by the barrier.

Subaru nodded in response to Garfiel’s point with a “yeah”. It was indeed a daunting task to overcome the Trial that Emilia had been challenging in the tomb.

Subaru: “But, there’s an alternative to that. Don’t worry about it.”

Garfiel: “Alternative? What’re ya gonna do?”

Subaru: “It’s simple. —I’ll clear the Trial myself. And for the remaining two, I’ll do them in Emilia’s place.”

Garfiel: “…What?”

Garfiel was surprised by Subaru’s confident assertion as he poked his own chest with his thumb.

Looking at Garfiel’s stunned expression, Subaru noticed that his face, which had lost its ruggedness, appeared rather young. He had not noticed it before due to the numerous tense situations, but perhaps Garfiel was younger than Subaru thought.

Anyway, the resolution of such an unhelpful question would have to wait.

Subaru: “I’ve already completed the first Trial. I know what the second Trial entails. Honestly, it’s difficult content… but probably just a matter of getting used to it.”

Garfiel: “Gettin’ used ta it?”

Subaru: “Yeah. I just hope I don’t get upset every time I’m shown something I don’t want to see.”

Regardless of whether or not such a forceful clearing of the Trial was intended, Subaru’s plan to overcome the second Trial was something along those lines.

The so-called unthinkable present showed many afterlifes upon worlds in which Subaru had Returned by Death—the pain and suffering of which he endured with a broken heart.

Even so, Natsuki Subaru believed what stood beyond was a happy future for everyone, which he sought.

Subaru: “That nasty, evil Witch just keeps playing coy, refusing to share anything about the third Trial…”

However, since the first Trial was about the past, and the second Trial occurred in the present, one could vaguely imagine that the third Trial would be about the future.

Although it was unclear what kind of hellish future awaited him after the unpleasant past and the painful alternate present—

Subaru: “—If that’s what’s supposed to break my spirit, then I won’t stop.”

He did not have an unbreakable spirit that would not be shattered by any impact.

Rather, the strength of Subaru’s heart, no matter how much he strengthened it, would only be as fragile as glass. Even though it might appear hard on the surface, it would crack and shatter with a strong enough impact.

However, the fact that it could be broken was not a problem. If glass were to be heated, it could be melted and reshaped.

The Authority given to Natsuki Subaru was, in short, the power to do so.

Garfiel: “…”

Hearing Subaru’s confident words, Garfiel held his breath.

He probably wanted to bite Subaru’s head off and say, “Don’t be ridiculous”. However, Subaru’s actions up to this point had silenced Garfiel’s budding rebelliousness.

Subaru, as an Apostle of Greed, had demonstrated abilities higher than Garfiel; informing him of the existence of the Great Rabbit and the threat it posed to the Sanctuary, opening the barrier that originating from the tomb, assuring him that he could clear the Trial that Garfiel himself had been so frustrated by.

Subaru: “…It’s not your fault, Garfiel.”

With those words, Subaru addressed the profile of Garfiel, who faced his own weakness.

No one was at fault. The situation, the environment, and the timing were all different types of bad—

Subaru: “—It’s just that your luck was bad.”

8

???: “—Congratulations! The threat to the Sanctuary has been eliminated!”

Subaru: “…”

???: “Hmm? You are not responding well. From what I could gather from your Memories, I thought this was a stylistic element of a celebration.”

As she said this, Echidna tilted her head, having greeted Subaru with a loud burst of sound.

In the hands of the confused Witch lie a cone-shaped, cylindrical party item, which had exploded with a dry sound—a party cracker, to put it simply.

Although it was probably an item that did not exist in this other world, in this fantastic space created by the Witch of Greed, it was no surprise that manipulating her imagination into shape was her specialty.

Subaru: "…The idea certainly isn't bad. Just, your ability to read the room is hopeless."

Echidna: "Oh my, that is not something to just let slide. Saying that I cannot read the room is, quite simply, an insult, is it not? Why should I receive such an evaluation?"

Subaru's comment on the colorful tape, which had popped out of the party cracker, as he removed it off his head was met with an objection from Echidna, who put her hands on her hips as if to express her opinion.

Echidna's lips pouted, and she seemed to be very upset that her elaborate hospitality had not been well received. In the first place, her attitude was already an indication of her hopeless lack of discernment.

Subaru: "You can grasp what's happening on the outside through this crystal, right?"

Echidna: "Hmm? Yes, that is correct. A proof of our Contract… through that Magic Crystal, I can see everything you can, including outside the Sanctuary. What about it?"

Echidna furrowed her brow as Subaru pointed to the Magic Crystal hanging from his neck.

Subaru sighed heavily at the confused atmosphere. Echidna, dissatisfied with his layered reaction, complained with a "What is it?", but she was genuinely at a loss for an answer.

Subaru: "I took Garfiel before the Great Rabbit and made him taste powerlessness. Did you think I'd be happy being celebrated for something that didn't leave a good taste in my mouth?"

Echidna: "…I thought you would. Conversely, if you cannot be happy about this, then what can you be happy about?"

Subaru: "Ugh…"

When the question was asked back, Subaru stumbled over Echidna's words.

Spreading her arms in front of Subaru, Echidna, with her quivering white eyelashes, said "Listen please?".

Echidna: "At present, hostility with Garfiel, who was the biggest obstacle in the Sanctuary, has been avoided, and you now have the potential to save those close to you, including your beloved girlfriend. Is this not the result of your struggles and accumulated deaths? And yet, you cannot be happy about it?"

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Natsuki Subaru, I am not asking you to become inhuman. Given Garfiel's situation and position, it is understandable to sympathize with him. But, that does not diminish your own achievements."

Facing the silent Subaru, Echidna reiterated her thoughts to make him reconsider.

Indeed, she was right; if he only looked at the results, he had chosen the best route. He had avoided hostility with Garfiel, and managed to steer clear of unnecessary confrontation with Shima. Garfiel, having learned about the threat of the Great Rabbit, would take the initiative to help evacuate the residents of the Sanctuary and the people of Arlam Village.

This would also lead to helping Emilia, Ram, and Otto.

Echidna: "Even if you were to praise yourself for your efforts, no one would blame you."

Subaru: "Echidna…"

Echidna: "If I may add, my assistance has played a part in the results you have achieved. If you are feeling down, it would not give me, your contractor, a pleasant feeling either."

Echidna, hands clasped behind her waist and leaning forward, peered upward at Subaru. Subaru felt suffocated by her gaze and words.

Subaru was so distressed by the sight of Garfiel fighting the Great Rabbit, shedding blood and tears, that it left him with a pessimistic view that he could not fully approve of his own actions.

That was why he had pointed out that Echidna could not read the room when they both saw the same thing but felt differently; however, it was Subaru who was actually unable to read the atmosphere, and had been hopelessly insensitive.

It was only natural that Echidna, his contractor, would be displeased.

Subaru: "…My bad. I wasn't paying enough attention to my surroundings."

Echidna: "Are you reflecting on it?"

Subaru: "Yes, I'm reflecting on it."

Echidna: "Can you promise to not excessively belittle yourself?"

Subaru: "Okay, I promise. Honestly, it's not my strong suit."

Echidna: "Can you say that you have been saved by the feelings of the intellectual and compassionate Echidna?"

Subaru: "Don't get carried away."

Approaching forcefully, he flicked his finger on the forehead of Echidna, who was gradually intensifying her demands.

"Gyah!" said Echidna, who was bending over and holding her forehead with her hand, becoming teary-eyed. With this little drama at his side, Subaru thanked the Witch inwardly and took his place at the tea party.

Atop a green hill, facing the Witch at a white table, that was Subaru's reserved seat.

The backrest creaked as he sprawled and sat roughly with his legs stretched out. Watching Subaru's behavior, Echidna, still holding her forehead, narrowed her eyes,

Echidna: "…Could it be, that you are embarrassed?"

Subaru: "Ding ding ding."

Echidna: "Does that sound mean "correct answer"?"

Subaru: "That's the sound of your likability dropping."

Her saying what should have remained unspoken, made him reconsider his relinquishing of her disgrace of being a "Witch who cannot read the room".

In any case, Echidna took her designated seat, and snapped her fingers conspicuously.

Instantly, the Dona tea, which had become tradition, was prepared.

Subaru: "…Hey, if you can bring out crackers, does that mean food and drinks are also free to choose? Then, can you give me a cola? Not bodily fluids."

Echidna: "Even if I were to recreate that cola, the ingredients would be no different from the tea you despise."

Subaru: "It's about setting the mood. Warm and cold are different, right?"

Echidna: "Is that so? Well, I shall consider it."

After receiving a less-than-reliable reply, Subaru had no choice but to reluctantly take a sip of warm tea. Since he would feel like he had lost if he tasted the tea, he swallowed it down in one gulp.

After gulping down his tea, Subaru rudely placed his cup on the table. At that moment, his eyes met with Echidna's, who was gazing at him with a relaxed smile on her lips.

Subaru: “What’s up?”

Echidna: “Well, I have started to feel like I can rely upon you a bit more… If we get a bit more comfortable with our Contract, then you will be able to talk to me without having to come all the way to the tomb.”

Subaru: “—. Does that mean I can just talk to you normally outside?”

Echidna: “Ah, is that not delightful? Since you probably have a lot of situations where you wish to discuss your thoughts with someone.”

Echidna smiled at Subaru while resting her chin on her folded hands.

Subaru was hesitant to agree with her words, but it was true that if he could freely communicate with Echidna outside, his range of actions would be greatly expanded.

It was difficult for him to justify going to the tomb every time he needed to consult with her.

Subaru: “Is this like an expansion of the functionality of this Magic Crystal? Can you tell me in advance what kind of updates are planned in the future?”

Echidna: “Do you require benefits beyond constant communication with me? …Oh, no, I simply am joking. There is no need for you to give me that scary look. Let me see, for example…”

Subaru: “For example?”

Echidna: “You will be able to come and go from the tea party freely. In other words, you can meet me anytime you want.”

Subaru: “I see… so, there aren’t any significant benefits.”

Echidna: “You are really cold and unforgiving, no?”

He sighed at Echidna's bland attitude, which was a response he should have expected.

However, he did not want to be greedy. Just being able to rely on Echidna as a consultant in his situation, where he was being thrown around, would bring him great mental relief.

If that were the case—

Subaru: "—So, shall we aim to release the Sanctuary right away?"

Echidna: "Oh my, are you already planning to challenge the next Trial? Perhaps you could take it a little slower…"

Subaru: "Will I really not be punished for being lazy? …No, I will be."

The more idle one was, the more fate would mercilessly take away what was important to them.

Knowing this from personal experience, Subaru did not succumb to Echidna's tempting suggestion of idleness. Even if he could redo it, it was better to not risk losing anything at all.

Subaru: "It was a good opportunity to see what happens after each Death."

Echidna: "Originally, the second Trial was not supposed to be that way. In your case, the alternate Present from the current one has become a deadly poison. However, it seems as though you can overcome this with brute force."

Echidna raised both hands and teased Subaru's head-on approach.

It was a banzai attack based on the premise that one's heart would be shattered, and was deserving of being mocked as reckless. If Subaru were alone, he would never have chosen it, but—

Subaru: "I have a lot of things to say, but I'm grateful to you."

Slowly standing up from his chair, Subaru told that to Echidna before leaving the tea party.

It was an embarrassing topic to discuss eye-to-eye, so he turned his face away and spoke a little quickly. Perhaps that was why Echidna stared at him with a surprised expression and said “Eh?” as her eyes widened.

However, he did not feel like repeating it again. So, he turned his back and walked away.

Echidna: “Wait a minute, wait a minute! If you are going to say something, say it properly!”

Subaru: “Get lost. No, don’t get lost. You’re the type of character who can’t take a joke, so I can’t mess around with you. Just be quiet.”

Echidna: “Wah, you spoke so fast! Which means, that was not a misunderstanding on my part just now!”

Subaru: “Shut up, shut up, shut up!”

As if she had just taken a demon’s head off, Echidna was shouting at Subaru’s back as he walked down the hill. Subaru covered his ears with his hands and decided to ignore her voice, saying he could not hear her.

Subaru: “Damn it, I shouldn’t have said that…!”

It was just a whim, he had pressed the wrong button in his heart; that was how he convinced himself firmly.

He was sure that he had seen a glimmer of hope in this dead-end situation, which had relaxed the chains on his heart a little. He might have also been swayed by the Witch’s sweet words from earlier.

After all, he could not be proud of himself for crushing Garfiel’s spirit. It was difficult to pride oneself on the result of hard work. — Even so, it was all thanks to Echidna.

Subaru: “You wicked Witch! I’ll deal with the rest of the Trials you’ve set up in a heartbeat!”

Subaru turned around and declared such to the Witch on the hill, flipping his middle finger towards her.

Since she was an ally rather than an enemy, there was no need to go out of his way to swear at her, but it was all due to the heat of the moment.

By encouraging himself in this way, he would be able to more easily attract favorable results.

It was a sort of jinx for Subaru, who had gone through a trial and error process before he caught this glimmer of light.

Echidna: “Isn’t wicked Witch is a bit too much…”

Echidna pouted at Subaru’s words.

But, she then quickly drove away her expression with a sigh, and smiled at her contractor as he pressed forth.

Echidna: “Give it a try, Natsuki Subaru. Are you really going to be able to pass a Witch’s challenge?”

Subaru: “Bring it on! I’ll show you what I can do. Go ahead and watch from the sidelines.”

The gazes of the Witch and the contractor crossed, and the challenge to overcome a new obstacle began.

However, there was no need to be afraid. With the Witch’s help, victory was assured. Even if it was just by a thin thread, the Witch had proven her insight to make it through.

The high, high walls surrounding the Sanctuary, which had seemed impossible to overcome alone. —They had been overcome by Echidna, with two hundred and thirty-two accreted Deaths of Subaru.

Echidna: “I shall support you as much as possible, Natsuki Subaru. —Please do your best, for my sake.”

Subaru: “I’ll do my best, but it won’t be for you!”

Subaru received the Witch’s cheers, unable to become serious until the end, and pushed open the door connecting the Castle of Dreams and reality, which lie beyond.

He was enveloped in a white light, and his consciousness returned. —Again, this was a reality where he would continue to struggle against Death.

And so, the Witch that was left behind smiled as she watched her contractor depart.

The white chair she was sitting in creaked, and she let her white hair flutter in the gentle breeze—

Echidna: “For someone who is not doing this for me… I wonder if that is really true?”

If that was so, why did the two hundred and thirty-two Deaths feel like a gift, stirring up her heart?

While rolling around this overwhelming feeling in her chest, the Witch of Greed sneered.

—With that smile, she decided to watch over her contractor’s struggles, fierce fights, and brave deaths through the Magic Crystal.

Prologue II:
The Witchbeast Master

—From the beginning, they had known that it was going to be a job unlike any other.

???: “Huff, huff…”

Gasping for breath, they trod through the dirt path, repeatedly glancing back over their shoulder.

They had been instructed to give heed to nothing else at all while they were running. They had been sternly warned that looking back would only slow them down and shorten their life.

Yet, they could not stop themselves from disobeying and looking back.

Such was the terror of the unknown that it eclipsed and obliterated the caution they usually observed.

???: “This is strange… so stra~nge…!”

Her face pale, the girl’s cherry blossom-colored lips trembled as she lamented the absurdity of the world.

Girl: “This, this is just like…”

—It was just like a nightmare.

She gasped and shook her head, trying to dispel the thoughts that had popped into her mind.

It was as if the enemy had foreseen everything: every hiding place, every plan, everything. Even the backup strategies she had prepared for unforeseen situations had been anticipated, leaving her with no escape route.

Even with all that said, she was nowhere near a position where she could merely quietly surrender on her own accord.

Should she be caught and fall into the hands of the enemy, she could not even fathom the kind of cruelty she would suffer; not at the hands of her enemy, but her own comrades. There was a certain negative trust that they would certainly carry out that cruelty.

An inner fear born from this negative trust. —And yet, even that was now secondary.

A different kind of hell, distinct from the one she had experienced countless times before, was rapidly closing in on her.

Girl: "Shadow Lion-chan…!"

Gasping for breath, a word of regret slipped from the corner of her lips.

In the distance, beyond the thick foliage of the trees, she could hear the Witchbeast that she had sent in—the death throes of the Shadow Lion, the Guiltilaw.

A Witchbeast unparalleled in its ferocity and cruelty. Yet, the Shadow Lion that had been dispatched to delay the enemy had fought in vain, falling prey to their venomous fangs and losing its life. —No, it was uncertain if it had even managed to put up a fight at all. The Shadow Lion was indeed a strong Witchbeast, but it had a tendency to charge straight ahead without thinking.

That reckless nature might have made it the perfect prey for this enemy.

Girl: "—Hk"

The more she thought about it, the more she felt she had made the wrong choice.

Right from the beginning, when she had returned to her hideout after finishing her patrols, she was trapped. From that moment on, she had been completely at the mercy of the enemy. The Witchbeasts she had gathered were all hunted down with Fire Magic Stones, and the remaining fighting force of her Witchbeasts was steadily whittled away, leaving the girl with no choice but to flee.

Sending the Shadow Lion out had been a hasty decision. She should have kept it by her side to protect herself, until the very end.

She was always one step behind. —In truth, it was supposed to be her forcing the enemy into such decisions.

Girl: “Elsa~…!”

Just as her options dwindled and her voice grew faint, her thin throat called out for her one and only ally.

The name had not been that of a Witchbeast controlled by her Divine Protection, nor of someone who had been ordered to accompany her by her terrifying Mother; it was the name of the one person she could truly consider her ally.

She was not here right now. She had been summoned and temporarily left her position. Ordered to stay behind, the girl was the only one remaining at the post. It was then that she was attacked.

Could it be, that even that summons was a ploy to separate her from her ally?

Girl: “It’s just, so wei~rd…”

Such a scheme was beyond merely predicting someone’s actions.

To control, manipulate, reel in the opponent’s actions, and finally achieve their inscrutable stratagem—was it not truly like the handiwork of a Witch?

???: “—Finally ran out of cards, huh? You really were a pain.”

Girl: “—Hk”

Immediately afterwards, the girl’s strength left her legs as she held her breath at the sound of the voice that had been thrown her way.

She slumped down and turned around. Her eyes met those of a figure emerging from the shadows of the trees she had just passed, and her throat went dry.

Girl: "—Ah, ah."

She had been wondering who could have set up such a trap, her mind swirling with confusion.

She had considered the two maids left behind in the mansion—aside from the Spirit she had heard about, one of them might have noticed their hidden presence and launched a counterattack. In that case, since one of the maids was someone she was familiar with, it naturally led her to suspect the other woman.

However, she was mistaken. Completely off the mark. —No, she should have realized it sooner.

Even Elsa had mentioned it. He was present at the scene of the failed mission in the Royal Capital.

The girl herself had seen him there. He was present at the scene when her plan had been thwarted and ended in failure. So why, up until this very moment, had she overlooked such a dangerous opponent?

???: ""He wasn't even on my radar.""

Girl: "…"

???: "And that's fine. In fact, that's what allowed me to set up this situation. Sorry, but I'll have to capture you now."

She was unable to say anything to the one who had read her thoughts.

She could only feel relieved that her life would not be taken here and now, though she was not sure if feeling relieved was the right response. Nevertheless, if she could survive this encounter—

???: "—I can't take Elsa down without you."

Those words, spoken so casually, shattered the faint hope that had begun to take root.

To capture her, and subdue Elsa. To use the girl as a bargaining chip, to make Elsa submit.

The moment she heard that, the girl’s vision turned crimson with rage and she tried to bite at him,

Girl: “—Ah.”

As she stepped forward, a white handkerchief was pressed against her mouth. The pungent smell assaulted her senses, pulling her consciousness away.

Though she realized she had been made to inhale something, it was too late. Strength drained from her limbs, her knees buckling beneath her. As her body began to collapse, surprisingly strong arms caught her and lifted her up.

—No. He was different, completely unlike the person he once had been.

Girl: “N-No~…”

The hoarse mutter was not directed at herself, nor at the person in front of her, but at someone who was not present.

You must not fight him. You must not challenge him or even face him. —You absolutely cannot win.

Desperately, frantically screaming these words in her heart, the girl’s consciousness sank into darkness.

Chapter II:
Accumulating Life in Another World from Zero with a Witch

1

???: “Oh, ooooh—!!”

Using the slope to his advantage, he launched himself upward, his arms outstretched toward the head of the colossal beast towering above him.

At the end of his arms was a pickaxe meant for breaking rock, which he then used with all his strength to slam at the enemy’s head—or rather, into the twisted horn protruding from there.

???: “—!”

The force of the impact reverberated up his arms, and the pickaxe he had struck with all his strength was violently repelled.

Landing on all fours upon the blackened earth, he caught a glimpse of the fallen pickaxe at the edge of his vision, frustration biting at him as he clenched his molars. —He had screwed up.

???: “—AROOOOOO!!”

A deafening roar blasted over him, freezing him in place and momentarily robbing him of control over his whole body.

With its arrival, was an inevitable shock that one could not bear even if one were to anticipate it. The bestial pressure that shook his very core, originating from the overwhelming difference in strength between species.

Pathetically, he had never once been able to withstand such a force, nor had he ever managed to evade it.

Every hair on his body stood on end, his blood froze in his veins, and his lungs ceased their function, as if they had been torn apart.

Even his heart seemed to forget to beat, and by the time his senses returned, it was already too late.

Before his eyes, he saw the gleaming claws of the beast as it swung them down at an angle, directly toward him.

In his strangely slow-moving vision, each claw seemed as large and sharp as a sword, each slash comparable to being torn apart by a bundle of blades.

It is said that when one faces a life-threatening situation, time appears to slow down. It is a defensive instinct of the brain, frantically searching for a way to survive in those fleeting moments.

Experiencing flashbacks during a crisis is similar to this defensive instinct, not as a way to re-experience one's memories, but as a means to search for a method of survival based on past experiences to overcome the immediate crisis.

But alas, how unfortunate. —In this slowed-down world, in all his past experiences, there was not a single way for Natsuki Subaru to escape from this situation.

Subaru: "—Ah."

A merciless slash cut diagonally across Subaru's body, the beast's claws hooking into his chest and abdomen, effortlessly ripping them apart with an unsettling ease that human bodies should not possess.

The burst of blood and the searing pain that followed arrived just a beat too late to register before the surreal sight of his body being torn asunder.

Thanks to that, Subaru was given ample time to thoroughly witness the horrific spectacle of his own body being shredded, a sight that would undoubtedly rank at the very top of the list of things no one should ever witness in their lifetime.

Though the experience of seeing his own organs was not entirely new—

Subaru: “Bgh.”

No matter how many times he had seen it, the impression it left never changed.

In an instant, an overwhelming sense of loss surged through him, followed by a searing pain that threatened to consume his mind. His vision became clouded and chaotic, and he fell backward as if his entire body had been ripped away.

The agony, the sense of loss, the encroaching awareness of Death; these feelings jumbled together in his consciousness, turning his mind into a chaotic mess.

But all of it, everything—

???: “—Whoa, that looks pai~nful. You’re rea~lly unlucky, Onii-san.”

His vision, was white and blurry. Someone appeared beside him. Or perhaps she had stood there all along. It was hard to tell if his ears were working properly. He could only hear a distant, high-pitched ringing. Mixed with that sound, a voice, half-exasperated, half-sympathetic, seemed to reach him.

???: “I don’t particularly want to make you suffer, you kno~w? This kind of killing, like Elsa would do, it’s not my style at a~ll.”

With a shrug, she offered a flimsy excuse. Though, to the one being killed, such words held no meaning. It was merely an attempt to lessen her own guilt. —No, she was probably unaware of that.

This truly was nothing more than idle chatter, made all the more grotesque by the bloody scene around them. She stood over a dying person, his innards spilled out, and yet spoke as if nothing unusual was happening.

What a monster. Time and time again, he had faced this creature, been killed by it, and learned of its cruel nature.

Subaru: “…”

Whether it was because his ability to feel pain had shut down, his thoughts were hazy, but remained rational.

His mind was already racing ahead to the “Next” time, frantically trying to gather as much information as possible. Even if he could redo everything, there was no reason to repeat the same mistakes.

He must make an effort to pick up every bit of knowledge he could in this loop—

???: “…Wha~t’s with that look in your eyes, Onii-san? It’s a bit sca~ry. —Shadow Lion-chan.”

The presence crouched down right beside him, her voice growing quiet as if she had seen something unsettling. Following the command in that voice, the massive beast that had torn Subaru apart began to move slowly.

Shadow Lion: “—AROOOOOO!!”

The enormous creature growled in displeasure, and Subaru could feel its foul breath wash over him—

???: “Goo~dbye, Onii-san. I’ll make su~re to send the others along to you as we~ll.”

With those twisted words of misplaced compassion, Subaru’s consciousness faded.

He could only imagine his upper body being crushed by the creature’s massive jaws as darkness finally overtook him—.

2

Subaru: “—Fucking hell!!”

???: “Whoa there.”

In his rage, Subaru swung his leg upwards, his foot colliding violently with the white table, sending it flying.

The steaming white cup, the confections: all of it flipped over, scattering across the green hilltop, and the sharp sound of breaking porcelain echoed as it shattered into pieces.

Perhaps the sound of shattering might have cooled the blood that boiled from his furious mind—

Subaru: “Fuck, fuck fuck fuck fuck fuck…!”

Clawing at his head, Subaru continued to grind his teeth painfully, with little hope for relief.

Frustration. Agitation. His vision turned red as an unbearable fury swirled within him. Though he knew it was pathetic to lash out at objects, he could not control the surge of his emotions.

Treading over the broken cup on the short grass, he sought solace in the sensation of destroying something beneath his heel. Yet, it was futile. The anger, the irritation: both only continued to grow.

???: “You are quite agitated, no?”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Breathing heavily and deeply, Subaru turned his head toward the voice that addressed him.

Beyond the overturned table, sitting calmly in the only chair that remained intact, was a Witch whose existence could be summed up in the stark contrasts of black and white—Echidna.

Before the table was kicked over, she had managed to secure her cup, bringing it to her lips as she serenely observed Subaru, who was consumed by intense emotions. Her calm gaze only served to further irritate him.

Echidna: “It seems like you have hit a wall. From the looks of it, it must have been quite a struggle.”

Subaru: “Cut the crap already! Don’t talk like it’s got nothing to do with you…!”

Echidna: “Unfortunately, at this moment, it really is not my problem. After all, I have not been filled in on what exactly happened to you yet."

Subaru clicked his tongue in frustration as he stepped closer to Echidna, who spoke in an indifferent tone.

Subaru reached into his chest pocket and pulled out the black Magic Crystal that hung around his neck. With a rough motion, he threw it at Echidna.

And then—

Echidna: "Ouch!"

Failing to catch it, the Magic Crystal struck Echidna on the forehead, leaving a cut on her alabaster skin. A pointed edge must have hit her, as a trickle of blood began to seep from the wound, running down the bridge of her nose.

As Echidna licked away the blood that dripped down with a soft swipe of her lips,

Echidna: "That hurt, Natsuki Subaru."

Subaru: "Shut up. I'm sick of your little theatrics."

Echidna: "Theatrics? How rude. I have no desire to suffer pain for no reason. I explored those curiosities fully in life, after all."

As she spoke of memories that hinted at harrowing experiences, Echidna bent down to pick up the Magic Crystal. Pressing it to her still-bleeding forehead,

Echidna: "Myon myon myon myon myon…"

She began another one of her familiar, nonsensical antics.

Subaru: "…"

The blood flowed from her forehead, and the Magic Crystal in her hand emitted a faint, eerie glow.

As Subaru watched Echidna's white eyelashes tremble with her eyes closed, he righted the chair he had knocked over and sat down heavily upon it.

He bounced his leg restlessly, dropping his clenched fists onto his knees over and over again. There was nothing here he could destroy in a fit of rage. At best, just the table or his own body.

Echidna: "I would not recommend self-harm. It is not particularly enjoyable to watch, from what I have seen. If you must unleash your violent urges, it is better to direct them at me."

Seeing Subaru's frustration, Echidna made an extreme suggestion.

Echidna had stopped pressing the Magic Crystal to her forehead and had ceased her ridiculous chanting. It seemed she had succeeded in inheriting the Memories and now understood the situation.

In other words—

Echidna: "Despite managing to avoid the issue of the Sanctuary, it seems you have been stuck for quite some time without resolving the problems at the mansion."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Although, since time resets each time you experience Death, what you perceive as a long time is just a matter of your own subjective experience."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Hmm… in the past, when I said something like this, I remember it provoked quite a strong reaction from you. But it seems that trick will not work anymore."

Echidna squinted with one eye, as if disappointed that her attempt to provoke Subaru had failed.

Indeed, there had been a time when her words, filled with empty provocations, had stirred Subaru's anger, causing him to lash out with a fierce impulse.

He could not remember how many times ago that had been, nor did he want to recall that awful memory.

The worst thing was not taking out his anger on something. Subaru knew this, not just as knowledge, but from experience. —That was what truly made it the worst.

Echidna: “It is a pointless regret. After all, was it not my suggestion when we made our Contract? I told you that, when you could no longer bear the weight of your repeated Deaths, you could use me as an outlet. You are free to punch, kick, or even strangle me; whatever you like. Of course, other things are fair game, too.”

Subaru: “…Stop it.”

Echidna: “Do not worry; I am quite accustomed to most forms of humiliation. Pain is no exception. I can control my emotions, so I am well-suited to be a sandbag.”

Subaru: “Stop it.”

Echidna: “Or would it comfort you more if I cried and begged, clinging to you for mercy? I am not particularly good at it, but it is not like I cannot do it. If it helps you let off steam, maybe it would not be a bad idea to learn such techniques. I could shed tears, plead for forgiveness, and…”

Subaru: “STOP IT—!!”

Shouting, Subaru surged to his feet and shoved Echidna backward, toppling the chair along with her. Straddling her as she lay on the ground, he wrapped his hands around her slender neck.

Her white hair and black dress were in disarray as Echidna narrowed her black eyes, gazing up at Subaru. As he met her captivating stare, Subaru could hear the thunderous pounding of his own heartbeat in his ears.

If he applied enough pressure with his hands, he could silence her by snapping that slender neck.

And so—

Subaru: "—Ah."

His hesitation lasted only a moment. Perhaps one could say he was overcome by a sudden, wicked urge.

There was a light snapping sound, like breaking a twig, and along with the sound of her breath escaping, a dreadful sensation ran through Subaru's hands. Her body immediately went limp beneath him.

Subaru: "…"

Echidna's head tilted to the side, her flowing hair concealing her face from Subaru's view. Yet, even with her face hidden, the stench of death that clung to the motionless Witch's body was unmistakable.

—She was dead. No, he had killed her. Subaru had snapped her neck with his own hands.

Subaru: "…Urghh."

The hands he pulled away from her pale neck felt unbearably repulsive. A wave of nausea surged up, and with a groan, Subaru vomited up bile from his empty stomach.

Splattering yellow gastric juices across the dead woman's chest, he swung his arms down beside her lifeless body, again and again, wanting his wrists, his forearms, his entire arms to tear off.

The lingering sensation of snapping her neck stayed with him, and it was unbearably revolting.

If it would help him forget that feeling, then he did not need his arms. —No, he did not need anything at all. Not his eyes, ears, nose, mouth, legs, or even his internal organs. Every part that made up his body was unnecessary.

After all, it was all useless. It was just there, making him feel sick. If it was all worthless and had no reason to exist, then it would be better if it were broken. Yes, that would be for the best.

Subaru: “Die, die, die die die die, just die, Natsuki Subaru…!”

Hot tears streamed from the corners of his eyes, and snot smeared across his face.

Thinking himself filthy and repulsive, Subaru stopped using his arms and began to slam his head into the ground over and over. Again, and again, and again—

Subaru: “I’m dirty, dirty, dirty dirty dirty dirty dirty dirty dirty dirty dirty…”

???: “—It is okay, you are not dirty.”

Subaru: “…”

As Subaru wished to erase his filthy self, his body was gently embraced from behind.

He held his breath at the warmth of the touch, unable to immediately understand where that comforting warmth was coming from.

However, a familiar voice and warmth pulled Subaru’s head closer, whispering softly into his ear.

Echidna: “No matter how much you deny yourself, I will affirm you. You are not wrong. And even if you are, you can make things right. So, there is no need to be anxious.”

Subaru: “Ugh…”

Echidna: “Even if you split my forehead, break my neck, and vomit on my corpse, I will forgive you.”

It was a form of acceptance so violent that it could hardly be called total affirmation.

It was something seemingly darker, unrelated to kindness or compassion or such warm things; something ill-suited to soft descriptions. That was why it could only be rephrased as acceptance or tolerance.

And, perhaps, because of that, he did not need to harbor false hopes, or suspect some form of deceit.

Subaru: “Ugh, ah, aaahhh—!”

Echidna: “There, there, it is okay. Cry as much as you want. No one else is listening.”

Subaru grabbed onto the arms holding him, pouring out the torrent of emotions swirling within his body.

The Witch accepted it, quietly allowing him to do so.

She forgave, accepted, and embraced it all. —As if, she knew that was the best remedy.

3

???: “Have you calmed down now?”

Seated on a chair, Subaru had slumped forward onto the table. A voice called out to him.

However, Subaru could not respond. He held his head in his hands, feeling drained and wishing to escape from everything.

Yet, the Witch, with her insidious nature, blocked any path of escape Subaru might have had.

Echidna: “Oh, I did not hear a reply. Could it be a side effect of having my neck broken?”

Subaru: “…I’m sorry.”

Echidna: “Huh? What? Sorry, I did not quite catch that. You know, since my neck was broken.”

Subaru: “I said I’m sorry! And what does breaking your neck have to do with your ears?! Do you lose your hearing if you break your neck?! Who the hell came up with that theory, huh?!”

Infuriated by the persistent Witch’s teasing, Subaru sat up abruptly.

In response to his outburst, the white-haired Witch leaned back with an exaggerated “Oh” as the chair creaked beneath her.

Around her slender neck, the marks of strangulation remained, and traces of blood were still visible on her face from the wound on her forehead.

Subaru: “Is this some kind of harassment?”

Echidna: “It is just a bit of cute payback. I was hurt by your tantrum, after all. If I did not retaliate like this, you would just keep feeling guilty, would you not?”

Subaru: “…If that’s your way of being considerate, you probably shouldn’t have said it out loud, should you?”

Echidna: “Sorry. I could not help but prioritize teasing you over being endearing.”

Echidna stuck out her red tongue slightly, a mischievous expression on her face.

Not that Subaru would say that was a bad thing, but he let out a deep sigh. At the same time, he realized that the storm of furious emotions swirling in his chest had subsided, and it was becoming easier to breathe.

This was all thanks to Echidna, who had put herself on the line to help him vent his frustrations.

Echidna: “Well, this is not the first time I have seen you this worked up. I have confidence in the amount of knowledge I have accumulated. —I can handle something like your periodic Days of Wrath.”

Subaru: “…Days of Wrath, huh.”

Echidna: “A fitting naming, is it not? I am also quite fond of the contrasting Days of Calm. They carry the weight of the history we have built together, after all.”

A faint blush colored Echidna’s cheeks as she wore an expression akin to one reminiscing about fond days gone by. However, what she was actually referring to were Subaru's Days of Wrath, when he was no longer able to suppress his emotions and would explode; and the opposite, the Days of Calm, when his emotions would die, leaving him like a living corpse.

Neither scenario matched the girlish expression Echidna was wearing.

Thinking of this as Echidna's way of helping muddle Subaru's feelings of shame might have been giving her a bit too much credit.

Echidna: "I do not mind whatever biased view you have, so long as you keep thinking highly of me."

Subaru: "…Ding, ding, ding."

Echidna: "Hmm, it seems I did not quite succeed this time. I thought I was getting pretty close, though."

Echidna shrugged her shoulders, disappointed at having pushed too far. But, she was not wrong.

This time, she had almost managed to change his opinion of her. Not that there was any rule saying he could not reassess or acknowledge her.

Subaru: "But still, it would feel like I lost on an emotional level…"

Echidna: "Well, considering you broke a girl's neck in a fit of anger, it is safe to say you have definitely lost if we had to speak in terms of victory and defeat."

Subaru: "Ugh."

It was such an irrefutable argument that Subaru could only let out a groan as a form of rebuttal.

At any rate—

Echidna: "—It seems like you are struggling."

As the previous topic was wrapped up, she introduced a new subject.

It was one that had caused Subaru's mental state to fluctuate wildly, so his response was anything but cheerful. As Echidna had mentioned, he had successfully managed to avoid the issues surrounding the Sanctuary.

By taking control of Ryuzu Shima, warning Garfiel about the approaching Great Rabbit, and persuading him to help evacuate the people remaining in the settlement, Subaru had cleared the Sanctuary and lifted the barrier surrounding it by completing the Trials in the tomb.

Naturally, he had to pay significant sacrifices to clear the second and third Trials, but,

Subaru: "That was just my death count piling up. It's not a big deal."

Echidna: "True. Seeing you push through with brute force, just as you had declared, was rather refreshing. Though, the second Trial is essentially a one-shot challenge."

Subaru: "A one-shot challenge…"

Echidna: "It is a choice between staying in an alternate Present or coming back. If you fail, the challenger's spirit cannot return here. Quite a risk, would you not agree?"

Echidna spoke nonchalantly, but Subaru was taken aback by the sheer ruthlessness of it.

At the same time, he felt a sense of relief that Emilia had not been forced to undertake such a dangerous Trial.

She, too, needed a chance to challenge herself and break out of her shell.

However, that opportunity did not need to come in a high-stakes situation. One where failure would mean more than just her own life, but also the lives of many others.

Subaru: “Anyway, I’ve cleared the Trials. Though, it’s annoying that every time I start over, I have to take on the Trials again, since my Return by Death resets everything to just before I face the Trials.”

Echidna: “Any complaints about that should be directed to the one who has bestowed that Authority upon you. Still, showing them the moment when the barrier around the Sanctuary breaks has helped you gain the trust of Garfiel and the others, has it not? It has given you quite a bit of extra time.”

Subaru: “Yeah, true.”

Only when both conditions, the approach of the Great Rabbit and the lifting of the barrier, were met, would Garfiel listen to Subaru. Although his cooperation was reluctant, not having to rack his brains to convince him each time was a result of Subaru’s repeated trial and error.

However, the other issue that had arisen simultaneously with the Sanctuary had yet to be resolved, despite Subaru’s numerous attempts through trial and error.

Echidna: “The duo that appears at the Roswaal mansion, the Bowel Hunter, and the Witchbeast Master…”

Subaru: “…No matter how many times I go through it, someone always ends up getting killed. Beatrice, Petra, Frederica… and, Rem.”

Echidna: “And, half of the villagers who stayed behind in Arlam Village. If only you could decide whom you wanted to prioritize in saving…”

Subaru: “—Echidna.”

Subaru stopped rubbing his forehead and called out to Echidna in a low voice. Immediately, Echidna withdrew her statement, raising both hands and saying “I was just kidding”.

This, too, was an argument they had gone through many times before—if Subaru could choose whom to save, more options might open up, and he could find a breakthrough.

Trying to save both the mansion and the village was what made it impossible. If he could just ease up on his efforts to save the villagers, how much easier would it be—.

Subaru: “There’s no way I’d be allowed that kind of weakness.”

Echidna: “Not allowed, you say? And who exactly would not allow it? The God from your world?”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “Sorry to disappoint, but there is no God in this world. The closest thing would be something called Od Lagna, but it has no will, nor does it judge people.”

The term “Od Lagna” was one he had heard a few times before. —It seemed to refer to an unimaginably vast conceptual existence in this other world.

It existed, but did nothing. In a way, it might have been similar to the God Subaru knew from his own world. In that sense, he agreed with Echidna.

However—

Subaru: “It’s not God, or whatever that Od thing is, that wouldn’t allow it. It’s me.”

Echidna: “Hmm…”

Subaru: “Choosing whom to save and whom to let die is the kind of thinking a God would do. If I start picking and choosing whom to save, I’d be no different from some mechanical God.”

In the end, Subaru was just an ordinary, mundane human being.

Those under the delusion of excessive power or authority would easily be led astray. Subaru knew that once he crossed a certain line, he would start taking the easy way out.

That was why, he could never lower the hurdle he had set for himself.

Subaru: “I’m going to save everyone, both those in the mansion and the village. I won’t decide whose life is worth saving and whose isn’t. Don’t make me have this conversation again.”

Echidna: “I shall keep that in mind. However, you have to understand that I am not always aware of your past experiences before sharing your Memories with me, so please be a bit lenient on that.”

Subaru: “Then, at least act as my strategist, and show that you’re worth having around.”

Subaru and Echidna exchanged sharp words, glaring at each other. Then, with a snap of Echidna’s fingers, their usual tea and tea cakes were laid out on the table.

Indeed, this routine had become so ingrained that it could have been called their usual way of operating.

From breaking her neck to losing his sanity, the repeated trial and error were filled with grim, inevitable events.

In such an environment, maintaining some routine of normalcy was necessary to avoid being swallowed by madness.

So, Subaru and Echidna each picked up a cup and drank their tea.

—To set aside the notion that both killing the Witch and engaging in self-harm were simply part of the bargain.

Echidna: “Anyway, let us get back to the main topic. Though, the cause of death this time is pretty clear.”

Subaru: “…Yeah. I got my head bitten off by one of the beasts of the Witchbeast Master, of Meili.”

Subaru responded as he straightened his posture, refocusing on the main issue that Echidna had brought up.

To be precise, Subaru’s death was sealed the moment he was struck by the beast’s claws. His entire front had been ripped open, and with his insides spilling out, there was no way he could have survived.

However, more than the fatal injuries, it was the shocking impact that was etched into his memory. Being eaten headfirst by a Witchbeast was, after all, a particularly intense experience.

Honestly, being eaten by a Witchbeast was not an uncommon cause of death for him lately. Even so, he could never get used to the feeling of his very existence being devoured and lost to another creature.

Echidna: “Just when you managed to avoid getting chomped on by the Great Rabbit in the Sanctuary.”

Subaru: “Whether it’s a giant Witchbeast or a small one, being eaten feels just as bad either way… It’s impressive, that Wilhelm-san managed to escape from the White Whale’s belly, though.”

Echidna: “His training was on a different level, and when you are talking about such a vast difference in size, that changes things as well.”

In Subaru’s memories, it felt like ages ago when he had faced off against the White Whale. And yet, he recalled Wilhelm, who had once been swallowed by the creature during that battle.

In the end, he had managed to slice his way out of the Witchbeast’s body, and escape from within.

Could the difference really be attributed to something as simple as a difference in physical capability?

Echidna: “You do not think it is just a matter of sheer determination, do you?”

Subaru: “—. You think it’s unrelated?”

Echidna: “Not just unrelated; I think it is a nonsensical notion. Firstly, how much of a difference in determination do you think there is between an old swordsman, who has spent over a decade hunting the Witchbeast that killed his wife, and you, who continues to die to protect those around you?”

Subaru: “I…”

Echidna: “It is not something that can be quantified. That is why I will say it again: this is pure nonsense.”

Echidna cut down Subaru’s thoughts without mercy, her voice firm.

The way that she occasionally slipped in words from Subaru’s world was a result of her learning from viewing his Memories, as well as a sort of persuasive tool.

The extent to which Echidna understood Subaru was precisely what made her arguments compelling when he was seized by weak thoughts, becoming a reason for him to listen to her.

Subaru: “But, if it’s not about a lack of determination, then what am I supposed to do to fill that gap…?”

Echidna: “—Hmm. Perhaps, we need to approach this from a different angle. Up until now, you have focused all of your efforts on defeating the Guiltilaw, the Witchbeast Master’s trump card. Correct?”

Subaru: “…Yeah. There were times when things went well when I just killed it.”

Nodding at Echidna’s words, Subaru recalled the Witchbeast that had devoured him.

The Shadow Lion, the Guiltilaw, was a Witchbeast with the head of a lion and a body that looked like it was made up of parts from various animals. It had the appearance of something akin to a chimera, and was just as troublesome to deal with.

In any case, it had immense physical strength and was extremely ferocious. Because of its somewhat reckless nature, like that of a charging wild boar, there were a few times when it had been brought down by traps. However, that only dealt with the Guiltilaw itself, and did nothing to address the problem of Meili, who was controlling the Witchbeast.

Therefore, he was seeking more than just the defeat of the Guiltilaw.

Subaru: “That’s why, I want to break its horn.”

Echidna: “If the horn of a Witchbeast is broken, the Witchbeast must obey the commands of the one who broke it. If you can tame the Guiltilaw, it might provide a countermeasure against the Witchbeast Master. However…”

Subaru: “—? However, what? The way you’re saying it, it’s definitely not going to be good news.”

Furrowing her well-shaped eyebrows, Echidna hesitated, causing Subaru to grimace.

In recent attempts, he had been repeating Deaths with the strategy of trying to steal away Meili’s powerful Witchbeast pawn. Echidna’s hesitation seemed to be throwing cold water on that plan.

Echidna: “I mean, it is a bit hard to say it.”

Subaru: “I see. Well, I’ll go ahead and die a few times with the current plan until you make up your mind… it’s not like I’ll say that. Each and every time, I’m doing it with the literal intention of dying.”

Echidna: “I understand. I do not want to have my neck broken by you again in a fit of madness.”

Subaru: “Look, I’ve already apologized for that…”

As Echidna brought up the topic they had previously put behind them, Subaru glared at her. In response to his piercing gaze, Echidna raised both hands and said, “You win, you win”.

Echidna: “Really, there is no need to make such a scary face. It is not like I am simply joking around.”

Subaru: “If you want me to believe that, then start talking. What’s so hard to say?”

Echidna: “Alright… I think it would be better to give up on the plan, to break the Witchbeast's horn."

With a raised finger, Echidna proposed a complete reversal of their strategy.

Subaru's eyes widened slightly at her words, but he quickly took a deep breath to calm himself. He did not immediately raise his voice in anger.

Subaru: "Let's hear your reasoning first. We can talk after that."

Echidna: "I appreciate your rationality. It is not a complicated matter. Do you remember what I told you about how Me… how that girl controls the Witchbeasts?"

Subaru: "—It's the Divine Protection of Fiend Manipulation, right? You said it's a Divine Protection that allows her to command Witchbeasts."

Echidna: "That is correct. Even without breaking a Witchbeast's horn, she can control them just like someone who has broken it. It is a Divine Protection that truly befits the Witchbeast Master."

Subaru narrowed his eyes at Echidna, who nodded while clasping her hands in front of her chest.

The coercive power of a Witchbeast's horn was perhaps the only fair characteristic of these dangerous and ferocious creatures, which were not even suitable for consumption. Despite this, Meili could ignore this fundamental principle, and convince the Witchbeasts she was their master, exerting her control over them.

Echidna: "That said, there is a limit to Divine Protections. Your plan to break the Guiltilaw's horn was based upon expecting that limit."

Subaru: "If we actually break the horn, we could find out whether the Divine Protection or the horn's coercive power is stronger…"

The recent deadly battle had been, in a sense, a challenge to determine that. Unfortunately, even when he had managed to land a powerful blow, the Witchbeast's horn did not budge, resulting in a series of futile deaths.

However, what seemed like meaningless deaths to Subaru was not necessarily viewed the same way by the Witch.

Echidna: “Even if you did not manage to break it, you dealt considerable damage to the horn. It would not be strange if that had caused some disruption in the Guiltilaw’s movements. And yet, there was no such effect. Perhaps…”

Subaru: “Perhaps?”

Echidna: “Perhaps there was no effect because Meili’s Divine Protection, is far stronger than we anticipated.”

Comparing her knowledge with the current situation, Echidna reassessed the power of Meili’s Divine Protection.

Then, with a snap of her fingers, Echidna said, “Listen up,”

Echidna: “—Is this not just perfect for putting our thoughts in order?”

As Echidna spoke triumphantly, the world around Subaru abruptly transformed before his eyes.

The green hill where the tea party was taking place changed in an instant, and before he knew it, Subaru found himself in a familiar place—inside a school classroom.

Before he knew it, both Subaru and Echidna were wearing school uniforms.

Just like when they had met in the fabricated past world, during the first Trial in the tomb.

Subaru: “…What’s the meaning of this?”

Echidna: “Like I said, it is to help us sort things out. I wanted to use this thing called a blackboard. As for our outfits, think of them as a little surprise.”

Echidna swished the hem of her short skirt playfully as she walked over to the blackboard. Grabbing a piece of chalk, she began writing in white letters, thoughtfully laying out information in Subaru's native Japanese.

Her writing was authentic, using hiragana, katakana, and even kanji with great proficiency.

Subaru: "If you accidentally got reincarnated into my world, I have a hunch you'd do just fine."

Echidna: "I appreciate the compliment, but it is all thanks to peeking into your Memories. It is kind of like cheating."

Subaru: "Then, I'll praise you for being good at cheating."

Echidna: "I am not sure if being called a good cheater is really a compliment."

With a wry smile, Echidna continued writing on the blackboard without hesitation.

Watching her back, Subaru rested his chin on his hands atop the desk in the classroom, a place that held no fond memories for him. Outside the window, he could faintly see the schoolyard and the cityscape.

If this place truly was a perfect recreation of the world from the Trial—

Echidna: "—Your parents, they are not here."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "If I gave you false hope, I do apologize. I only borrowed this classroom because I needed it."

Placing the chalk down, Echidna spoke to Subaru, who was gazing outside.

Subaru replied softly with a simple, "I see". Even if this world had been perfectly recreated and his ersatz parents were here, what would it matter?

Would he cry to them about being thrown into situations where his emotions repeatedly exploded and sank like clockwork, making him feel as if he were in hell?

Subaru: “Like I could ever be that unfilial… Echidna, continue your explanation.”

Echidna: “Understood. Now, please look at the blackboard.”

Without any unnecessary consideration, Echidna pointed to what was written on the board.

Drawn in white chalk were the names of Witchbeasts and a series of simple illustrations depicting them. The drawings, capturing the creatures’ distinctive features, were surprisingly well-done, causing Subaru to widen his eyes in astonishment.

Echidna: “It might come as a surprise, but I have written quite a few books. Including illustrations makes things easier to understand, so I can do this much.”

Subaru: “I see, I’m genuinely surprised. So, about these illustrations…”

Echidna: “There is the Shadow Lion, the Double-Headed Serpent, the Blackwinged Mice… and, I think I saw a Rock Pig in the mix.”

Drawn on the blackboard were images of Meili’s forces, the Witchbeasts she had used to attack the Roswaal mansion. The approximate numbers and size comparisons were also sketched out, making the information easy to comprehend, although it was frustrating to admit.

Echidna: “These are the Witchbeast troops you need to handle. Any questions?”

Subaru: “Ah, I have a question that isn’t specifically about the mansion, but about Witchbeasts in general… for example, if the horn of the boss of a herd is broken, what happens? Will the rest of the herd submit as well?”

It was a notion derived from stories in his original world, the kind of scenarios often seen in manga or anime, where defeating the leader of a group would result in the entire group falling under the victor's control.

He wondered if such rules could also apply to the Witchbeasts, and whether this could serve as a countermeasure against Meili's Divine Protection—

Echidna: "It is an interesting conjecture, but that is not how it works. If the leader… the boss of a herd has its horn broken, that individual loses its status as the leader. The moment its horn is broken, it is deemed unfit to be at the head of the herd."

Subaru: "…Well, that does sound like a likely rule."

If the hierarchy of wild animals was determined by strength, then a leader whose horn was broken would not maintain its position. For Witchbeasts, it seemed that having a broken horn symbolized weakness.

To damage such a symbolic trait was to invite that outcome. He had also heard about this before from Ram.

An Oni with a broken horn would be scorned and called hornless.

Echidna: "In other words, there is no loophole in the rules. We have to face Meili's Divine Protection head-on, even if it is an unfair advantage."

Subaru: "Unfair advantage, huh… I'm sure Meili would say the same thing about me, a Witch's accomplice who uses Return by Death."

Echidna: "I would have to disagree with that. Authorities are privileges that allow one to interfere with the world, while Divine Protections are like afterthoughts, tacked on as a nuisance to people like us."

Subaru: "I feel like this is important information, but it doesn't seem related to subduing Meili, does it?"

Echidna: "Oh my, you still are not interested in indulging my digressions, are you?”

Echidna shrugged her shoulders, looking dissatisfied as she stood at the podium. However, Subaru was not concerned with the truths of the world, or of the origins of Witches.

His only focus, was on overcoming the obstacles in his path, and securing a future with everyone.

Subaru: “Let’s get back on track. What did you mean when you said Meili’s Divine Protection might be far stronger than we anticipated?”

Echidna: “It is not commonly known, but… Divine Protections can have individual differences, and even potential for growth.”

Subaru: “Seriously?”

Echidna: “Yes, seriously.”

Echidna nodded repeatedly, smiling as she affirmed Subaru’s surprise.

Her attitude was rather frivolous, but for Subaru, who did not possess a Divine Protection, it was a complete shock. Since he naturally did not have one, he never had the chance to think deeply about Divine Protections in the first place.

Echidna: “For example, the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, which the whole species of ground dragons possesses, is an easy one to understand. This Divine Protection prevents the wind or any turbulence from affecting them while they run… however, the range and duration of the Divine Protection can vary greatly between a ground dragon that has run long distances and consistently used the Divine Protection, and one that has not.”

Subaru: “So, that’s what you mean by individual differences and growth in Divine Protections.”

Echidna: “In most cases, if their Divine Protection were to stop working, it is usually assumed that the ground dragon simply got tired from running. Since ground dragons do not talk, it is easy for it to go unnoticed.”

Other than the example of ground dragons, it seemed that users of Divine Protections could often use their abilities more effectively as adults than they could as children.

This was often misunderstood as simply becoming more accustomed to their Divine Protections over time.

Echidna: “Many cannot fully grasp the potential of their Divine Protections, and end up being overwhelmed by them during childhood. There may even be people close to you who have suffered because of their Divine Protections.”

Subaru: “When you put it like that, Divine Protections don’t seem like they’re just convenient powers.”

Echidna: “They truly are not. Having a power that others do not have might make one feel special, but having a third arm or a third eye does not necessarily make a person happy.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “I suppose you would agree with that sentiment, considering you possess an Authority unlike any other, would you not?”

Echidna slowly stepped down from the podium and walked over to Subaru’s desk, tilting her head slightly. As Subaru watched her soft, white hair cascade over her slender shoulders, he fell silent.

Needless to say, Echidna was referring to Subaru’s ability, Return by Death. And, of course, Return by Death was far from a convenient Authority.

If he could go without using it, he would. It was more like a curse that he would prefer to avoid.

Subaru: “…So, what you’re saying is that despite all the attempts we’ve made so far, we haven’t uncovered the limits of Meili’s ability. That means, if we keep fighting the same way, it might not yield any results.”

Echidna: “Exactly. That understanding is spot on.”

Subaru: “Then, that means there’s nothing we can do?!”

Setting up the classroom and making a big deal out of it, only to end up with no solutions, left him deeply frustrated.

Leaning back in the familiar feel of his chair, Subaru looked up at the ceiling lined with fluorescent lights. Even though the environment had changed, the sense of confinement and suffocation remained the same—

Echidna: “Nothing we can do, you say? —I see you are underestimating me.”

However, as Subaru lamented their lack of options, the white-haired Witch appeared upside down in his field of vision. Leaning over Subaru’s face from the side, Echidna smiled at his surprised expression.

Echidna: “Four hundred years ago, rulers from all over the world came to me for counsel. You should understand that the Witch with whom you made a Contract is such a being.”

Subaru: “…You mean, you have another plan?”

Echidna: “Of course I do. Otherwise, what would be the point of having you take my hand in the first place?”

Echidna answered with complete confidence, and Subaru’s eyes widened at her words. He slowly straightened his body and pressed his forehead against hers as she leaned in to look at him.

At such a close distance that he could feel her breath, Subaru gazed into Echidna’s black eyes,

Subaru: “Tell me. How can we deal with Meili?”

Echidna: “…Sometimes, you just erase the distance I have courageously closed in an instant. It does not feel bad, but I do feel like I am being played with, you know.”

Echidna pulled her forehead away, gently touching her slightly reddened cheek. Meanwhile, Subaru stood up from his chair, facing her directly and urging her to continue.

Seeing Subaru's reaction, Echidna let out a sigh and prefaced her statement by saying, "About Meili's Divine Protection,"

Echidna: "Its limitations far exceed what we initially expected… so far, so good?"

Subaru: "Yeah. If that's all there is to it, then I'll be left feeling completely hopeless."

Echidna: "I hope that hearing the rest will lift your spirits. Now, I have outlined the types of Witchbeasts that Meili controls. Considering the ones stationed around the mansion and keeping an eye on Arlam village, it is safe to say that she has hundreds of Witchbeasts under her command."

Subaru: "…"

Hearing Echidna's rough estimate, Subaru felt as if his vision was going dark.

To be honest, even a single small Witchbeast would pose a considerable threat to Subaru. But here, he was dealing with hundreds of them, including the ferocious Guiltilaw among them.

How on earth could this situation possibly turn into good news—

Echidna: "As a result of your bold attempts, there has not been any disturbance in the Guiltilaw's control. In other words, it is safe to say that she can handle controlling hundreds of Witchbeasts without any issue."

Subaru: "The more I hear, the worse I feel. Are we supposed to launch a missile at them or something?"

Echidna: "Back when I was alive, I might have been able to do something similar, but whether that would annihilate them is questionable. Also, have you noticed? I have been subtly dropping hints."

Subaru: “Hints?”

Hearing her words, Subaru widened his eyes in surprise, thinking that the crux of the matter was still to come.

He had assumed that the writing on the blackboard was simply a way to outline their dire situation. But, to hear that there were hints hidden within it for dealing with Meili—

Subaru: “—Oh, I see.”

As his thoughts raced, he could almost hear the gears in his head clicking into place.

Seeing Subaru mutter to himself as if guided by that sound, Echidna gave a faint smile. It was the entrancingly beautiful, yet cruel smile of a Witch.

Subaru: “…”

As the Witch watched over him, Subaru tried to put together the possibility that had come to mind.

At this stage, it was just an idea. The method to make it a reality would come next.

But even so, if he could think of a possible way to break through this situation.

Echidna: “Your Authority allows you to pry open even the tiniest possibility.”

Subaru: “Echidna…”

Echidna: “By repeating endless attempts and trading away pieces of your worn-out soul, you can turn any possibility into reality. Stacking up countless corpses of yourself, you reach for heights otherwise unattainable. That is something only you can do.”

Gently, Echidna extended her hands and wrapped her arms around Subaru’s neck. Subaru found that, for some reason, he could not reject the soft, slender arms of the Witch.

Even Subaru himself could not be sure whether he was being captivated by the Witch, or trembling with anticipation for the challenge that awaited him.

But—

Echidna: “—No matter how many times, hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, or even hundreds of millions of times you try, I shall be with you.”

The Witch whispered this reassurance into his ear, and in that moment, her embrace felt like a salvation to Subaru.

Subaru: “…”

Held by Echidna’s slender arms, which radiated warmth, Subaru closed his eyes.

In the end, Subaru could not shake the feeling that he was being manipulated in the palm of the Witch’s hand. But, that was fine. To avoid collapsing here, Subaru needed some form of emotional support.

In that sense, the presence of Echidna, who called herself his accomplice, was quite convenient.

So long as he was aware of this relationship, he could convince himself that he was not completely bewitched by the Witch.

Subaru: “…We’ve found a way to deal with Meili. Now, all that’s left is…”

Echidna: “The existence that is even more troublesome than the Witchbeasts. Shall we come up with a strategy for that together as well?”

Subaru: “—No, I already have an idea.”

Echidna: “Oh? How impressive.”

Admiration shone in Echidna’s eyes as her alluring aura seemed to fade slightly. Subaru sighed and gently removed her arms from around his neck.

Freed from her embrace, Subaru stepped back, putting some distance between himself and the Witch. Echidna narrowed her eyes at this action, but did not press further; instead, she crossed her arms over her chest,

Echidna: “So, shall we give it another try?”

Subaru: “—. Yeah, let’s do that. But, before we start, there’s just one thing I want to ask.”

Before restarting the battle to subdue Meili, Subaru fixed his gaze on Echidna’s face. He then asked her a question, catching Echidna off guard.

Subaru: “You came up with a way to deal with Meili much earlier, didn’t you?”

Echidna: “…It was difficult to bring up.”

Subaru: “Go to hell.”

Subaru contorted his face in a dramatic grimace, raising his middle finger and cursing at her.

After being made to die in vain so many times, he figured he had earned the right to do that much at the very least.

4

—Why had he not made that choice?

If you asked him, he would likely say he had simply been too afraid.

Their last encounter had seared itself into the chronicles of Natsuki Subaru’s life as the worst event he had ever endured. It had left such a lasting scar that he had resolved to sever all ties from the very start.

But when circumstances made avoidance impossible, he knew he had no choice but to swallow his dread and press forward. After all, had he not overcome the most harrowing of Trials?

Therefore, even if their chemistry was the worst imaginable, he should be able to overcome it.

Subaru: "—Roswaal, I know about the Book of Wisdom. I know you've been orchestrating all sorts of sinister schemes. So let's talk with that in mind."

With the room cleared, Subaru spoke, and for a moment, Roswaal's eyes widened in astonishment.

His mismatched eyes—one blue, the other yellow—stretched wide in surprise. For a fleeting second, Subaru glimpsed something almost human behind them.

Despite his disgraceful nature that made him never hesitate to sacrifice others for the sake of his own aspirations.

They were in the Sanctuary. The house belonged to Ryuzu, yet Subaru could not help but always think of it as the place where Roswaal convalesced.

Wrapped in bandages from head to toe, lying on that bed—Roswaal had been in that state for so long that it had become his new, permanent image in Subaru's mind.

The thought of his usual jester-like outfit did not stir any fondness in him. Subaru had no intention of reflecting on it, nor did he care to.

Roswaal: "…Subaru-kun, did you hear about it from meee~?"

After a brief silence, Roswaal's lips formed a familiar question.

The last time Roswaal had asked this, Subaru had been speechless. And in return, Roswaal had slaughtered Ram and Garfiel before his very eyes. Fortunately, the two of them were not present this time.

Garfiel had been clued in on the removal of the barrier and the incoming threat of the Great Rabbit. By now, he was likely being persuaded by Shima. As for Ram, Otto had taken her away to distract her, as per Subaru's instructions.

Emilia was still resting. She needed solace after her heart had been shattered by the Trial, and it was fine for her to learn later that Subaru had completed the Trials.

Indeed, everything else could wait. Nothing mattered except this conversation with the warlock before him.

Roswaal: "Subaru-kun, won't you answer me? Who told you about my book…?"

Subaru: "Yeah, it was from you, Roswaal. You told me yourself. Does that answer satisfy you?"

Roswaal: "—!"

At that moment, Subaru could see delight swirling in Roswaal's eyes.

Subaru had seen Roswaal laugh and raise his voice many times before. But now, he intuitively sensed that none of those instances had revealed his true colors.

The pure joy he displayed now, with a hint of childlike innocence to it: this, Subaru realized, was Roswaal's true face.

Roswaal: "If… if what you say is true, then surely you know what comes next?"

Subaru: "…You'll summon snow upon the Sanctuary, and the Great Rabbit, drawn by the Mana, will swarm here. Every last soul in this place will be devoured, including you."

Roswaal: "Ahh, I see. So, my manipulation of the weather serves another purpose beyond just tarnishing Emilia-sama's impression of me. But, as for dealing with that snow…"

Subaru: "I've already dealt with it. I've cleared the Tomb's Trials. The barrier is gone. By now, Garfiel is persuading everyone to evacuate."

Roswaal: “Fuh, haha! Hahahahaha!”

Roswaal’s voice trembled, his hand pressed to his forehead as he erupted into raucous laughter, his mouth stretching wide.

Subaru frowned at the display. Roswaal quickly shook his head and offered an apology before continuing.

Roswaal: “I expected this outcome… no, I hoped for it. Yet, now that it’s happened, I can’t help but find it… oh, so very strange.”

Subaru: “Strange? What’s strange about it?”

Roswaal: “Don’t play it off so casually, Subaru-kun! Are you truly unaware? You have broken the barrier that has bound this Sanctuary for four hundred years, and shattered Garfiel’s rigid, childish obsession, all in just half a day. How could anyone not laugh at such a thing!”

Hearing Roswaal’s words and boisterous laughter, Subaru became aware of the discrepancy between their perceptions.

To Roswaal, Garfiel, and everyone else in the Sanctuary, Subaru was just a newcomer who had arrived less than half a day ago.

Yet, despite this, Subaru had found the solution to many problems in half a day—or more precisely, within just a few hours, since his Return by Death had set the starting point at the tomb.

It was no wonder Roswaal would describe his accomplishments as strange.

Subaru: “So, what? Are you starting to feel scared of me?”

Roswaal: “Oh, I wish you wouldn’t say it so lightly. The truth is, yes, I’m terrified. I had anticipated the outcome of your Authority. But this… This far exceeds what I imagined…”

Subaru: “I’m not here for idle chatter. I’m running out of time, and of all people, you know exactly why that is.”

With both his words and gaze sharp, Subaru stared directly at Roswaal, who lay on the bed, his eyes narrowed.

Roswaal's gaze was attempting to gauge Subaru's intentions, but if he wanted to understand them, he was welcome to try. If Roswaal's earlier claim of fear was sincere, Subaru would make sure it cut deeper.

After all—

Subaru: "You're the one who sent the assassins to the mansion, Roswaal."

Roswaal: "—. Would it do me any good to deny it or offer excuses now? Especially since, as you say, I'm the one who told you."

Subaru: "Unfortunately, this isn't something I heard directly from your mouth. I just pieced together scattered information, and you were the only possible culprit left. We haven't spoken much recently, after all."

Roswaal: "Hoh?"

With Roswaal not denying his pointed accusation, Subaru felt a mix of relief and bitterness well up inside him.

Holding onto those feelings, he dragged a chair next to the bed and sat down roughly, bringing his gaze level with Roswaal's as he faced the unfeeling warlock head-on.

Roswaal: "May I ask what you meant when you said we haven't spoken much recently?"

Subaru: "I'm not going to answer that. The point is, I've turned into the joker you were hoping for. So, the attack on the mansion doesn't need to happen anymore, right? Call them off."

Roswaal: "Oh my, how cooold~. If you've truly become the trump card I've long desired, why would you make such a request in the first place?"

Subaru: "…"

Roswaal: “With your all-powerful Authority, you can draw out the answers you seek. You shouldn’t need to rely on me for anything. But, if you can’t even do that…”

Roswaal squinted his yellow eye, scrutinizing Subaru as if measuring his worth.

The warlock’s gaze was assessing, as if he was trying to determine whether Natsuki Subaru was truly the disappointment he suspected.

If that suspicion became a certainty, Roswaal’s actions would surely turn ruthless.

Subaru: “Are you planning to burn everything to the ground again?”

Roswaal: “As I stand now, that’s nothing but empty slander, Subaru-kun. But I suppose it does shed some light on why you’ve been avoiding meee~.”

Touching his chin thoughtfully, Roswaal closed one eye and smirked.

The look in his eye, his knowing expression: everything about him grated on Subaru’s nerves. It was not just his schemes; it was his entire demeanor that made Subaru avoid engaging with him until the last possible moment.

Even though Subaru had used Return by Death to the fullest to accumulate experience and gain an advantage, Roswaal, driven by his own obsession and talent, was closing the gap Subaru thought he had widened in an instant.

Even with the head start Subaru had gained, Roswaal remained a formidable foe he could not afford to underestimate.

Roswaal: “You understand the danger I pose. And yet, you can’t bring yourself to get rid of me. That’s because you know just how essential I am to Emilia-sama’s rise to the throne.”

Subaru: “You really are an unbelievably troublesome bastard.”

Roswaal: “Securing my usefulness is a talent I’ve honed to perfection, after all. If someone gets in the way of your goal, you remove them, no matter who they are. It’s natural to prepare for such possibilities.”

With a smile that never wavered, Roswaal exposed Subaru’s weakness.

In truth, Roswaal’s perception was accurate. His scheming and plotting made him a lethal poison to the safety of Emilia and everyone in their faction, yet he was also a necessary evil that they could not afford to lose.

Without him, Emilia’s chances in the Royal Selection would all but crumble. That would be a catastrophic loss for Subaru, whose aim was to see her fulfill her ambitions and stay safe.

However—

Subaru: “But are you really irreplaceable, Roswaal? Do you seriously believe we can’t move forward without you? Knowing what I’m capable of, can you seriously say that to me?”

Whether Subaru would directly acknowledge that to Roswaal, was another matter entirely.

Roswaal: “—Hmm.”

Hearing Subaru’s bluff, Roswaal let out a thoughtful hum as if contemplating his words.

Seeing him lost in thought like that, Subaru could not help but notice a resemblance to Echidna. He knew that Roswaal was obsessed with the Witch of Greed, but perhaps there was more to their connection than he realized.

In any case, Subaru decided this was the moment to press his advantage.

Subaru: “Sure, removing you would complicate things, but it wouldn’t be a fatal blow. You understand that, don’t you? The true devastation for me would be…”

Roswaal: “Losing Emilia-sama, correct? But if you’re so focused on protecting the mansion, then perhaps you aren’t quite as decisive as you like to think. Am I mistaaaken~?”

Subaru: “I won’t deny it. But that doesn’t mean I’ve fallen short of your expectations. —It just means I’ve decided to save everything, without any more hesitation.”

Roswaal: “…”

Subaru slid his chair closer to Roswaal, closing the distance between them.

Bringing himself within arm’s reach was Subaru’s show of force.

He knew that if Roswaal so wished, he could easily kill him with a single chop of his hand. However, Subaru wanted to show him he had nothing to be afraid of.

Roswaal: “…If I were to refuse your request, would I become a target you need to eliminate?”

Subaru: “Yeah. I don’t want it to come to that, but let’s just say an “accident” might happen.”

Naturally, it was nothing more than an empty threat.

Subaru would not be able to justify himself to Emilia and Ram, and he did not think he could recover from the aftermath either.

His words sounded like something a villain or mastermind would say, and Subaru almost wanted to laugh at himself for it. But, now was not the time for laughter. —He had to carry this bluff through to the bitter end.

Roswaal: “…I can’t order her to stop.”

Subaru: “You…!”

Roswaal: “Wait, wait. I’m not finished. You understand who’s attacking the mansion, right? Do you really believe she’s the kind of person who can be easily persuaded?”

Subaru, who was about to grab Roswaal, stopped in his tracks at those words.

With his eyebrows lowered in frustration, Subaru could not deny that Roswaal had a point. —The assassin, Elsa, also known as the Bowel Hunter, was the type who would not back down, not even against someone like Reinhard.

Even if her employer withdrew the request, it was hard to imagine Elsa would simply give up on her prey.

Subaru: "Why would you hire someone so difficult to handle…?"

Roswaal: "I chose her precisely because she's difficult to handle. If I'm going to test you, Subaru-kun, then the ordeal needs to be worthy of you. Wouldn't you agree she's performing that role peeerfectly~?"

Subaru: "This isn't funny! Fuck, you really had to pick the most troublesome method possible…"

Roswaal's schemes had been exposed, and yet he continued to remain a formidable adversary. Clenching his teeth in frustration at the traps Roswaal had laid, Subaru desperately racked his brain for a solution.

He knew that calling off Elsa and her associate would be the best possible outcome, but if that was not an option, he had to make sure he was not left without any cards to play.

For instance—

Subaru: "So you can't stop Elsa. Fine. But you can tell her to change the plan, right?"

Roswaal: "—That should be possible. But what kind of change are you proposing?"

Subaru: "It doesn't need to be anything specific. So long as we can split them up…"

Hearing Subaru's answer, Roswaal furrowed his brows.

Even he could not fully grasp what Subaru was planning, which gave Subaru a small sense of satisfaction.

That said, Subaru's plan was not overly complicated. He had already devised a strategy to deal with Meili based on Echidna's advice. All he needed was to incorporate Roswaal's involvement into that plan.

Subaru reviewed the different combinations of options he had in his mind, and then lifted his head.

He could not definitively say which combination would be the best. However, that did not matter. So long as he had cards to play, and the opportunity to fight—

Subaru: "Then I'll just keep playing the game as many times as it takes, until I get the best hand possible."

5

—Just like with Garfiel, he could tell when he had hit the "jackpot".

???: "…"

It was likely the result of the staggering number of times he had repeated Return by Death.

He was already aware that his ability to smell Death had sharpened. As that sense expanded, and the equation between failure and Death became clear, he naturally learned to instinctively recognize the signals that spelled failure.

Thinking about it that way, considering how few of his experiences had ended in success compared to Failures, it might have been more accurate to say that he simply was not picking up on the stench of defeat this time.

Subaru: "It doesn't matter, either way."

If the result was the same, he did not care whether the path to that result was predominantly positive or negative.

The separation and diversion had been successful, leading to the enemy’s isolation. All that was left was to carefully observe and ensure that the baited target did not make any unexpected moves.

???: “Huff, huff…”

Ahead of him, a girl was running down the mountain path, gasping for breath.

Repeatedly looking over her shoulder to check for pursuers was a poor choice. He understood that instinct, but fleeing without regard for appearances was the best way to ensure survival. Looking back in fear only slowed her down, and invited Death to catch up.

Though she should have understood, even without thinking about it, that being caught meant certain death.

Subaru: “Ah, right, it really is over for you when you die.”

He shook his head, correcting the discrepancy in his thinking.

—The rules of life and death were absolute, except for Natsuki Subaru.

If he lost sight of that fact, it would eventually trip him up. He needed to remind himself of it regularly.

Girl: “This is strange… so stra~nge…!”

Her voice trembling, the girl’s breathing grew more frantic with each gasp.

It was no wonder. An unfamiliar mountain path, lack of stamina, and a chest full of fear made her lungs quiver, making normal functioning impossible. Subaru had experienced this before.

Though it had been a while since he had felt that kind of fear.

Girl: “This, this is just like…”

The girl, thrown into an unimaginable situation, seemed to have seen something unbelievable. If it were Subaru from a short time ago, he might have described it this way. —It was just like a nightmare.

Girl: “Shadow Lion-chan…!”

Her cheeks stiffened as the girl let out a desperate cry from her frail throat.

The name she called out was that of a brave Witchbeast that had followed her orders to hold back her pursuers—but, her scream never reached the Witchbeast.

Instead of the reassuring roar she had hoped for, all she heard was a bone-chilling, agonized death wail.

The Guiltilaw, a Witchbeast that had caused Subaru countless hardships, let out a blood-curdling scream as if it were vomiting blood. The death cry was cut short, likely because it had lost the ability to make a sound.

Girl: “—Hk”

It was a mistake. Instead of using the Guiltilaw to stall her pursuers, she should have used it to aid her own escape.

Had she ridden on its massive back and fled through the hills and fields, she might have had a chance. But, that opportunity had slipped away with one poor decision. Naturally, he had been the one to close off that path.

The experience from a previous encounter, where she had escaped into the mountains with the fight ending in a draw, had proven useful this time.

Considering the threat she posed, allowing her to escape was not an option. No matter what, he had to end things with this dangerous assassin here and now.

Girl: “Elsa~…!”

Tears streamed down her cheeks as she stumbled over branches and roots. Her braids came undone as she awkwardly ran, calling out her companion's name in a desperate plea for help.

She called out the name of her closest ally, more dependable than the Guiltilaw, or any of the other countless Witchbeasts.

In truth, if that person had been by her side, Subaru would have stood no chance.

That was why, he had used a card he was reluctant to use in order to separate the girl from that woman.

Girl: "It's just, so wei~rd…"

Cornered and overwhelmed by her circumstances, the girl shook her head in denial.

She understood her situation: separated from her ally, and stripped of the advantage her Divine Protection once provided. Her mind was in complete disarray, struggling to comprehend the reality she found herself in.

—And, at the same time, he could tell she had no more cards to play.

Subaru: "—Finally ran out of cards, huh? You really were a pain."

Girl: "—Hk"

Holding her breath, the girl came to a halt and collapsed to the ground. Her forehead was damp with sweat, her bangs clinging to her skin as she—as Meili turned to look at Subaru with an expression as if she had seen a ghost.

Seeing Subaru step out from between the trees ahead of her, her throat tightened in fear.

Meili: "—Ah, ah."

Her eyes widened in shock, confusion clear in her gaze.

Perhaps, because of their previous encounter during the Ulgarm incident, Meili might have thought that Natsuki Subaru would have been an easy target.

However, that perception had been completely overturned, as she had been utterly and decisively outmaneuvered.

It was no surprise. To her, the real threats were the Great Spirit and the combat-capable maid left back at the mansion. As for Subaru—

Subaru: ““He wasn’t even on my radar.”“

Meili: “…”

Subaru: “And that’s fine. In fact, that’s what allowed me to set up this situation. Sorry, but I’ll have to capture you now.”

Meili had no more pawns left to use. Even knowing this, Subaru could not afford to linger. While it was true that he did not want to give her any chance to fight back, there was another, more pressing reason.

Subaru could not risk getting killed himself in the process of executing his plan to suppress Meili.

As Subaru took a step closer, Meili’s expression showed a hint of relief. Realizing that she would not be killed right here, her fear seemed to ease slightly.

That reaction sparked intense anger within Subaru.

Did she have any idea, just how much suffering she and her allies had put Subaru through?

So, just before capturing Meili, Subaru decided to deliver a parting shot.

Subaru: “—I can’t take Elsa down without you.”

Subaru intended to use Meili as leverage against Elsa. Oddly enough, it seemed Elsa had a soft spot for her kin. Even a villain like her, must have had a sliver of humanity.

For a moment, Meili’s face twisted in shock, and she opened her mouth to bite back at Subaru. However, the Witchbeast Master, left with no Witchbeast at her side, was no match for Subaru.

Meili: "—Ah."

Subaru pressed a handkerchief soaked in a poisonous herb, one with a sedative-like effect, over her nose and mouth, causing Meili to lose consciousness.

The herb was said to be toxic in high doses, potentially leaving lasting effects, but Subaru chose to ignore that risk. After all, he was sparing her life, which was far more merciful than what she and her comrades had ever offered him.

Meili: "N-No~…"

Her strength drained from her limbs, and Meili collapsed, her body going limp as Subaru caught her.

As her eyelids fluttered shut, tears trickled down her cheeks, but they stirred nothing within Subaru's heart. No pity, no guilt. All that lingered was a quiet sense of relief, and—

Subaru: "—A feeling of satisfaction, that you got what you deserved."

???: "I see. That must feel quite satisfying, I'm sure."

A woman's voice emerged from the shadows, as though it had crawled out of the very darkness itself.

Subaru, still holding Meili, turned to face the woman who had materialized from the gloom—a figure that seemed as if a shadow had taken solid form.

He had made it just in time, teetering on the very brink of being too late, but—

Subaru: "Seems like I can finally settle my score with all of you. I'm really sick of seeing your face."

Woman: "I don't recall us meeting enough times for you to grow so tired of it…”

As she spoke, the woman tightened her grip on the kukri knife in her hand, a flicker of disgust glinting in her dark eyes as she glared at Subaru.

She was being uncharacteristically emotional. Subaru found this quite satisfying, and smiled.

A twisted, mocking sneer spread across his face, dripping with malice.

Woman: “You’ve grown far more unpleasant since the last time I saw you in the Royal Capital.”

Watching Subaru’s behavior, the woman—Elsa Granhiert muttered with visible displeasure.

6

Subaru: “—Don’t move. I know how much you care about Meili.”

Facing Elsa, the jet-black assassin, Subaru mercilessly carried out his hostage plan.

Holding the unconscious Meili from behind, he pressed a small knife against her neck. Even with Elsa’s inhuman speed, Subaru would still be able to slit her throat first.

Elsa: “…”

As expected, Elsa narrowed her eyes and remained still, just as Subaru had demanded.

However, the dangerous killing intent radiating from her entire body did not diminish in the slightest.

Elsa: “So, what now?”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Elsa: “What are you going to do next? You’ve taken Meili hostage, and immobilized me. I'll give you credit for that… but what's your plan from here?"

Twirling the kukri knife in her hand in an exaggerated manner, Elsa asked Subaru what he intended to do next.

It was true that Subaru had succeeded in restricting Elsa's movements by using Meili as a hostage. But, even if he were to command Elsa to take her own life, she would not comply without a guarantee that Meili would be safe.

In fact, risking Meili's life and attacking Subaru was probably the better option for her.

He could not let that happen. That was why—

Subaru: "You have your own rules. You won't abandon Meili. But, I also know you won't gently back down, either. So, I have a compromise."

Elsa: "A compromise, you say? I suppose I can at least hear you out."

Subaru: "I'll guarantee Meili's safety. In return, you'll obey me. If you do that…"

Elsa: "—I refuse."

In an instant, a chillingly seductive voice whispered close to Subaru's ear.

At the same time, a black blade slashed through the air, aiming for Subaru's right arm, which held the knife to Meili's throat.

Her intent, was to sever his arm from the elbow, and to rescue Meili.

But—

Subaru: "If this were the first time, you would've won."

Looking down upon Elsa, who was poised from her strike, Subaru spoke with a cold, cruel tone.

Hearing his words, Elsa lifted her face, her expression twisting as she saw Subaru soaring above the treetops, ascending into the sky. It was clear what had enabled him to achieve this.

It was only natural. From Elsa's perspective, this was nothing short of betrayal.

Elsa: "…Wasn't I acting on your request?"

???: "Yes, that's riiight~. I'm truly sorry about that."

The one responding to Elsa's resentful remark was a jester-like warlock hovering in the air—Roswaal L. Mathers, who had grabbed Subaru from under his shoulders, and saved him from the assassin's lethal strike.

Roswaal, the client, was now opposing Elsa, who had accepted his request.

Subaru: "It's because you didn't back down that we ended up in this ridiculous situation."

Still holding Meili under his arm, Subaru was pulled up by Roswaal as he spoke thus to Elsa. At his words, Elsa furrowed her brow as if to say she was being unfairly accused.

Since the person in question was not aware of it, it was understandable that she would want to claim innocence. However, considering how many times they had gone through this, and how she always refused to listen, Subaru was no longer moved.

In any case—

Subaru: "We've finally secured Meili, and guided the evacuation of the mansion and Arlam Village… now, all that's left is to finish you off."

Elsa: "…"

Subaru: "I'll be sure to use the same methods your sister did."

Coldly stating this, Subaru's gaze shifted to behind Elsa. Noticing the intent in his eyes, Elsa slowly turned to glance over her shoulder.

Her back was completely exposed, but he did not make a move. There was no need to do any such thing.

Even without him having to lift a finger, Elsa had already fallen into a hopeless trap.

Elsa: "—Despicable."

As Elsa spat out those words, an eerie presence began to close in around her, gradually tightening the noose.

It was not just one, or two. Not ten, or a hundred. There were far more than that. After all, it would take a number far greater than that to overpower the Divine Protection of Meili, the Witchbeast Master.

—The sound of evil fangs clacking together resounded, a noise that Subaru had heard countless times.

This was the trap that had been set to eliminate both Elsa and Meili, who had attacked the mansion.

Subaru: "Even knowing it's a trap, you still can't abandon Meili. You, you're a lot more human than I thought."

Roswaal: "And, that's why we will defeeeat~ you."

It was unpleasant for Subaru to be lumped together with Roswaal, but in truth, without his cooperation, the plan to defeat Elsa and Meili would not have succeeded.

Roswaal's presence was absolutely essential for luring the Great Rabbit, Subaru's ultimate joker.

Subaru: "Only someone with vast amounts of Mana and such great mobility could act as bait."

Roswaal: "You're quite demanding in how you use people. But, I truly, truly admire your willingness to use whatever is avaaailable~ to you.”

Subaru: “Tch. Stop with the unnecessary—”

He was about to tell Roswaal to hold his tongue, but his words were abruptly cut off.

The reason was Elsa, who had rushed up the trunk of a tree and leapt toward him, landing right in front of Subaru.

Subaru: “…”

Elsa’s sense of timing was commendable, exploiting the brief moment of distraction caused by his conversation with Roswaal. This development caught Subaru off guard, as it was something he had not yet experienced.

Therefore, it was purely by chance that Subaru thrust Meili into the path of Elsa’s blade.

Had Elsa not possessed such superhuman capabilities, she might have cut through Subaru’s torso along with Meili. But, she was endowed with prodigious abilities.

Which, had allowed her to stop her blade the moment she realized it would kill Meili.

Subaru: “You really do care about your family. —It makes me want to puke.”

Suspended in midair, Elsa was kicked away by Subaru, who spoke with disdain.

Elsa’s body slowly tilted backward and fell, plummeting straight down without any means of protection. She descended into the midst of the swarm of Witchbeasts, eagerly clicking their fangs and licking their lips at their prey.

She fell, completely helpless to stop it—

Elsa: “—You’re despicable.”

Subaru: “I know.”

Once more, Elsa spat out an insult uncharacteristic of herself.

It was uncertain whether Subaru’s reply had reached Elsa’s ears. There was no time to confirm, as she was immediately engulfed by the swarm of Great Rabbits, biting into her from every direction.

Great Rabbit: “—Kichi kichi.”

The slayer swung her kukri knives and flailed with her limbs, tearing into the approaching Witchbeasts. However, it did not last long. As her fingers and ankles were bitten off, her body helplessly crumbled.

Being hard to kill only served to prolong her agony before the Great Rabbit. It was nothing more than a cruel spectacle.

Roswaal: “Well done.”

As they watched down below as Elsa was devoured, Roswaal whispered to Subaru. Hearing the tone of his voice, Subaru twisted his lips in displeasure.

Roswaal: “Oh my, it’s quite disheartening to see that expression. I assure you that my congratulations are sincere.”

Subaru: “Shut up. It’s not over yet.”

Roswaal: “Indeed, we—no, your esteemed self and I still have the task of luring the Great Rabbit to the Great Waaaterfall~.”

Subaru looked at Roswaal with suspicion as he shook his head and corrected himself in more formal language.

Noticing Subaru’s intent to understand the reason behind the sudden formality, Roswaal smiled and continued,

Roswaal: “You are my savior. You have proven it splendidly. Therefore, I wish to offer the appropriate respect your esteemed self is due. That is all there is to it.”

Subaru: “…Is that so.”

The sincere admiration, the chewing sounds of the Witchbeasts below devouring his bitter enemy, and the faint heartbeat of the girl in his arms: all of it was irritating, causing Subaru to grimace as he touched the Magic Crystal around his neck.

Only the black Magic Crystal knew the extent of Subaru’s success, and the countless failures he had endured after each attempt.

His throat dry, Subaru clearly understood that this knowledge was his only solace.

Great Rabbit: “—Kichi kichi.”

Chomp chomp, crunch crunch. The sound of the Great Rabbit’s gnawing echoed loudly.

Right now, more than anything, all he wanted to hear was the aloof voice of the Witch.

7

Shrouded in white light, his vision suddenly cleared.

What greeted Subaru was a green meadow and a cool breeze, a white table and chairs set up on a small hill, a steaming cup of tea, and sweet-smelling tea cakes.

And, the one who had prepared all this was a Witch, whose appearance was defined by the stark contrast of black and white.

Echidna: “—Well done, Natsuki Subaru. At last, you have fulfilled your dearest wish.”

As Subaru climbed the hill and stood before the table, Echidna watched him and gave a small round of applause.

Even her words of congratulations and welcome seemed laced with ulterior motives. It was almost a kind of talent. Subaru scratched his cheek, her demeanor threatening to ruin the afterglow of his sense of accomplishment.

Still, she was a familiar face. Her voice was one he had grown used to hearing.

Echidna: "—? What is the matter? You do not look very happy. Could it be, that my congratulations were too plain?"

Subaru: "No, that's not it…"

Echidna: "I even thought about making it more extravagant, decorating the place and inviting the other Witches for a grand celebration. I could have changed into a more festive dress instead of my usual outfit. You are a boy, after all, so I thought you might hope for a bit more of a welcoming spectacle…"

Subaru: "That's definitely not the case. This is fine as is."

Misinterpreting Subaru's brief silence, Echidna tried to make everything more complex, so Subaru motioned for her to stop with his hand.

Then, he sighed and sat down in the seat prepared for him across from Echidna. Gently, Subaru picked up his cup, letting the warm aroma waft into his nostrils.

However, it was a strange tea, one whose scent gave no indication of whether it was sweet or bitter.

Echidna: "Have you grown addicted to it yet?"

Subaru: "When it comes to Dona Tea, I always tell myself that if I don't drink this, I won't be able to Return by Death next time."

Echidna: "What a way to phrase it. Well, considering it is your lifeline, I suppose you are not entirely wrong."

Despite her words, Echidna gave a wry smile, seemingly enjoying herself.

Perhaps, she truly was pleased that Subaru had achieved his goal.

Subaru: "That would be surprising."

Echidna: “What do you mean by that?”

Subaru: “I thought you’d be hoping I’d struggle more.”

Echidna: “Hey now, you are being quite blunt with your words. I am still the Witch who made a Contract with you, am I not? There is no way I would dislike my contractor’s wish coming true. That is something only those creatures from your memories, uh…”

Subaru: “—Demons.”

Echidna: “Yes, that was it. Only a demon would feel that way, do you not agree?”

Echidna pursed her lips, snapping her fingers and pointing at Subaru.

Subaru offered a brief apology. Whatever the truth might have been, it was true that Echidna had genuinely congratulated him on achieving his goal, even if it was just on the surface.

In that case, accepting it, even if it was just a pretense, was the proper thing to do.

Subaru: “I’ll gratefully accept your lip service.”

Echidna: “I thought we were talking about how it was not just lip service…”

Echidna sighed deeply as she spoke. Then, bringing her cup to her lips, she continued, “Oh well, no matter”,

Echidna: “It is hard to get you to accept things at face value… but, you have done it. That is a fact. Right?”

Subaru: “—True. Yeah, you’re right.”

Reminded by Echidna, Subaru blinked a few times before nodding.

Indeed, just as Echidna had said, Subaru had finally achieved his goal after countless failures. He had resolved the problems surrounding the Sanctuary, dealt with the Great Rabbit and Garfiel, passed the Trials, and saved everyone.

He had also solved the issues at the Roswaal mansion, defeated Elsa and Meili, thwarted Roswaal's schemes, and saved all those he wanted to save.

He had found solutions to both situations, which had seemed to be at a dead end, and reached the right conclusion.

Without anyone dying, without letting anyone else die, they had all finally reached Tomorrow together.

And yet—

Subaru: "…I just don't feel it."

Echidna: "…"

Subaru: "Step by step, I went over everything, making sure there were no mistakes or oversights, scrutinizing every move. And, I finally made it here, but…"

Looking at his trembling hands, Subaru could not be sure if he had truly reached the opposite shore he had desired.

So long as Subaru kept pushing forward, he was able to keep his doubts at bay. He could focus entirely on how to overcome the problems right in front of him, without getting distracted by unnecessary thoughts.

However, now that all those efforts had borne fruit, what had surfaced instead were feelings of anxiety and uncertainty.

He did not feel the slightest bit of a sense of accomplishment; no feeling of satisfaction filled his heart.

Subaru: "If anything, I just feel more and more anxious."

Echidna: "Anxious? Why?"

Subaru: "I don't know! I really don't get it. I don't know the reason at all. It's just that, if things go on like they have before, then the starting point for Return by Death will probably be updated."

If Subaru's previous experiences and Echidna's speculation were correct, Subaru had to overcome a significant challenge for the starting point of Return by Death to update.

On the other hand, while he had infinite chances to try again, Subaru could never return to a problem he had already cleared. Even if he had left something behind.

He was worried that he might have left something else behind again, just like how he could not save Rem from her coma.

Thinking that way, he felt like he was unable to contain himself.

Subaru: "Did I really not screw anything up? Is it okay for me to celebrate solving that problem? Has something irreversible happened somewhere I can't see?"

Echidna: "…Within the range of what I can observe, nothing of that sort has happened."

Subaru: "But, your sight only covers what I can already see! What about beyond that?"

Grabbing the Magic Crystal from around his neck, Subaru slammed it down on the table.

The crystal, a symbol of his Contract with Echidna, allowed her to see what Subaru saw. However, it did not extend beyond his field of vision.

If someone far away, separated from him, were to get hurt, Subaru would not be able to know.

Subaru had thought he had finally overcome the wall standing in his way, but now this anxiety and fear were coming at him in a new form—

Echidna: "—Calm down, Natsuki Subaru."

As Subaru trembled in fear of the unknown, a gentle voice softly reached his earlobe from close by.

Echidna, who was standing beside Subaru, gently pulled his head to her chest, cradling it softly. She stood to his right, embracing his head tenderly.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru held his breath, and stiffened in surprise at the Witch’s unexpected action. As she gently stroked his head, Echidna asked softly if he had calmed down.

Echidna: “I have heard that the sound of a human heartbeat has a calming effect on others. What do you think?”

Subaru: “…I can’t hear your heartbeat.”

Echidna: “Hmm, maybe that is because I am dead. I never really paid attention to that before.”

Echidna seemed surprised by this unforeseen issue, but not appearing particularly concerned about it,

Echidna: “But, I can hear your heartbeat very clearly. At first, it was fast and loud, then it jumped strongly for a moment, and now it is still a bit fast, but quieter.”

Subaru: “Gh…”

Echidna: “It seems my soft skin had some effect after all.”

Subaru: “G-Get away from me!”

Subaru ground his teeth as Echidna grinned triumphantly, and he shook off her arms that were holding him. As she backed away with a playful “Whoa there”, Subaru glared at her and stood up from his chair.

Subaru: “Stop messing around! I’m serious here. I’ve been seriously thinking and worrying…”

Echidna: “You are worried about everyone around you. I know that.

I was not messing around, either.”

Subaru: “Then…!”

Echidna: “I just chose the quickest way to help. According to my calculations, we do not have much time to ease your anxiety. It seemed best to make a quick decision.”

Subaru leaned on the table with one hand, eyeing Echidna suspiciously as she answered.

Did she just say, she would ease Subaru’s anxiety? But, how could she do that?

Subaru: “Is there a way to do that…?”

Echidna: “I understand the worries and concerns that torment you. It is true that I cannot see beyond your field of perception, and I had not expected this kind of pitfall. I had not expected that your heart would not be at peace after solving your problem.”

Subaru: “Answer. My. Question! Echidna! Can, you get rid of this anxiety?”

Stepping forward, Subaru closed the distance between them. He fixed his eyes on the white and black Witch, his voice rising with intensity.

Subaru wanted a straightforward answer without any pretense. How could he find relief? —No, Subaru did not care about himself. What he wanted, was to save everything else.

To save the people around Natsuki Subaru, those who made up his world.

For that, he needed to know—

Subaru: “What should I do?!”

Echidna: “—You should die.”

Her face was so close to his that he could feel her breath, her long eyelashes nearly brushing against him. Her otherworldly beauty stared straight into Subaru's eyes as she quietly sentenced him to death.

Die. That one word that had passed Echidna's lips made Subaru's eyes widen, and his breath catch in his throat.

Instead of reacting with immediate outrage, Subaru tried to accept and understand that Echidna's words were not a joke or jest.

And, after asking himself why over and over again, the answer became clear.

Subaru: "So, you're saying I should try again, to find a better path?"

Echidna: "—Yes, that is exactly it. You have resolved the issues of the Sanctuary and the mansion, and you have most definitely saved everyone there. But, if there exists any regret or dissatisfaction with the outcome, you can still address those as well."

Subaru: "…I, could do it better next time."

Echidna: "I am certain you could. But, you have to do it before the one who granted you this Authority deems this situation acceptable. Before the checkpoint of Return by Death is updated."

Spreading her arms wide, Echidna added this clarification to ensure that Subaru understood.

The new path Echidna had suggested was nothing short of a revelation to Subaru.

After all, Subaru had chosen the right path. He had made the correct choices. And yet, because the result did not sit well with him, he could throw it all away and start over, in search of something even better.

Doing such a thing would be the epitome of—

Echidna: "—Greed."

Hearing Echidna voice the word that had come to his mind, Subaru stared intently at her.

He expected to see her laughing with a wicked expression in response. But, Subaru was mistaken. —Instead, Echidna's eyebrows drooped, not in mischief, but in quiet sorrow.

Echidna: "It is a cruel path which I suggest. You realize that, do you not? If you continue like this, even when you choose the right path, it is likely you will never be satisfied."

Subaru: "…And, you'd be happy to watch that, wouldn't you? To see all the different outcomes unfold."

Echidna: "Please do not take this lightly. I am genuinely worried about you. If you keep pushing yourself, one day, your heart may crack and shatter."

Echidna's serious gaze took Subaru by surprise, making him raise his eyebrows.

At the same time, Subaru started to wonder if he had been mistaken in his understanding of Echidna, of the Witch.

Echidna had witnessed these hundreds of journeys alongside Subaru. He had thought those experiences would not affect a Witch like her.

However, that was Subaru's way of looking at things; a view filled with pride.

Subaru: "—I won't break."

Echidna: "You cannot be sure of that. This has already gone far beyond what we had originally envisioned…"

Subaru: "But, you're here, aren't you?"

Echidna's eyes widened in surprise as Subaru cut her off mid-sentence.

Amused by her surprise, Subaru gave a wry smile, his shoulders relaxing.

Subaru understood Echidna's concerns. He also realized that he was about to throw himself into an unimaginable struggle, and that it was reasonable to doubt his sanity.

But, if he was going to risk breaking, if he was going to walk that razor-thin line between sanity and madness, Echidna would be his reassurance.

Subaru: "Your job is to keep me from losing it, isn't it? That was part of the Contract. Have you already forgotten the terms of your own sales pitch?"

Echidna: "I-I have not forgotten. Of course, I intend to do everything I can."

Subaru: "Then, do just that. —I'll make sure my heart doesn't break, either."

Subaru's argument was weak in terms of justification, but Echidna remained silent for a while after hearing it, her shoulders slumping. She pressed her hand to her forehead, and shaking her head,

Echidna: "Fine, fine. You are right. It was I who had suggested this in the first place. If you need to, you can take out your frustrations on my body however you like…"

Subaru: "Yeah, that helps. Keep a stock of neck bones ready."

Echidna: "There are other ways to comfort you besides breaking my neck, you know!"

Echidna's voice rose in response to Subaru's excessively unscrupulous comment.

Subaru could not help but laugh, as his exchange with Echidna had become so funny to him.

To his frustration, the fear and anxiety that had been swirling around in his chest until just moments ago had subsided enough for him to take another step forward towards a reckless plan.

He had found the correct answer. And yet, seeking an even better outcome, he would plunge back into the darkness once more.

Subaru: “If I’m going to die anyway, I might as well aim for the best outcome.”

Echidna: “You know, that kind of resolve does not really suit someone about to throw themselves into death. You really are serious, right?”

Subaru: “Yeah, I’m serious. I’ve always been serious. It’s too late for you to have any regrets now.”

Subaru extended his fist to Echidna, signaling for her to join him on this journey to hell. At first, Echidna hesitated, confused for a moment.

Seeing Echidna’s uncertainty, Subaru pushed his fist forward again, making his gesture clear.

Subaru: “This is a new beginning for Natsuki Subaru. You had better hold on tight and come along for the ride.”

Echidna: “Very well. —Truly, you are a most remarkable contractor.”

With a faint blush on her cheeks, her eyebrows lowering with a mix of sorrow and other emotions, Echidna brought her arm forward to meet Subaru’s outstretched fist with her own.

And so, Natsuki Subaru decided to start anew, seeking new possibilities.

Echidna: “—Yes, you truly are an exceptional contractor.”

Watching her contractor depart with renewed determination and vigor, the Witch narrowed her dark eyes.

He moved forward with a positive attitude, diving into the darkness to pursue a better future.

She had not truly guided him. She had simply mentioned it because the opportunity presented itself, hoping for that outcome. If things went well, it would be a gain; if not, there would be no loss.

That said, it was true that she did not want to see him get hurt.

She had no hesitation in using her knowledge, experience, and resources to prevent his heart from breaking.

Echidna: “Though, it would be nice if that obsession of his made him take a bit more interest in me.”

Putting aside her previous sentiments, the Witch muttered to herself as she ran her hands over her figure.

She knew she was not lacking in charm. In fact, she considered herself to be in the better category, which made Subaru’s indifference all the more perplexing.

Echidna: “Well, I suppose it is rather charming, too. Not everyone is like this single-minded boy, so devoted that he is willing to sacrifice himself time and time again. —For now, I shall respect that obsession of his.”

After all, his determination was so powerful that he no longer viewed Death as Death, or even feared it.

If that burning desire was his driving force to move himself forward, she, the Witch of Greed, would never deny it.

—For now, she would simply wish in silence, hoping that her contractor’s new challenge would be filled with the sweet unknown.

Prologue III:
The Versatile Steward

—That was, the way of a soul who had lived a fearsome number of years and vehemently matured.

It was beyond conjecture what way of life must one take, for the soul to get shaped this way.

He had walked this world for what felt like an eternity, yet standing here, he realized just how narrow his understanding still was.

He was taught so, however, threw all of his sentimentality for it behind.

There existed no time to halt, to contemplate. The crisis had already been set in motion.

???: “Even if I were to surrender, a way to survive surely would not be presented before me. Nonexistent.”

He had unwittingly danced upon a carefully laid-out board, moving exactly as the enemy had desired.

By the time he took notice, no place to escape remained, and he had been entirely isolated from the environs. For him to be helplessly isolated here, he could find no such spectacle in even his oldest, most ancient of memories.

Overwhelming disadvantage, the choice to flee also came to his mind, however—,

???: “—To let that thing go, would be outrageous. Foolishness.”

He could not choose that option, his sense of purpose, now akin to decaying wood, asserted.

As aforesaid, what made him pile up the impossible experience of doubting his own eyes, was the existence of the owner of a soul smothered in wounds and patches.

However, the object awakening his greatest sense of crisis and vigilance was not his personage.

Nestled beside that soul, the owner of the traces of a dusky, wicked, devious and malicious existence. —That which he was acquainted with, was the soul of a Witch who should have perished centuries ago.

???: “Not even considering that the Factor came unstuck and got inherited by the next vessel, to think she yet has not cleared herself of her flawed ideas… no, perhaps that tenacity itself is precisely their true form. Dispiriting.”

A hand on his eyebrows, he adjusted the slightly off monocle back to its position and sighed.

Their relationship could not be labeled as a friendship from antiquity, nothing more than acquaintanceship that existed long in the past. Anyhow, reuniting with an acquaintance after this much time had passed was not something particularly frequent.

And, reuniting with the Witch, was something not meant to be ever again.

???: “The world is already in a new era… to barge onto its stage. Inelegant.”

The world, was something that ought to be the stage of those living in that era.

Himself and the rest, as well as those women and the rest, had an era where they had the world as their own stage. Their selves had lived through that era, and had expired. That was how it was supposed to be.

Yet, to cling to the stage even after death, was befitting of being labeled as the acme of boorishness.

???: “…”

Upon directing his concentration toward his environs, the presences of many people clamored within the magnificent structure.

A Witchbeast called a calamity, and a hazardous person who had tormented people for long had been respectively subjugated, this was a ceremony to thank, reward and commend those who achieved these meritorious feats.

The Royal Candidates too were attendees, thus it was a significantly auspicious event for the Kingdom.

Hence, neither could the opponent do anything untactful, he therefore intended to finish this in one move.

When it came to the chaos and hounding subsequently caused as well, he was supposed to have readied himself to counter, and yet.

???: “It is as though, my actions had been foreseen… no, to say as though, it is but a foolish act to repudiate what is transpiring. Senility.”

To do away unanticipated actions of the opponents as sheer coincidence would be the deed of a simpleton.

Moreso when those except himself, were always contemplating the greatest way of action. He must simultaneously attempt to outstrip those greatest ways of action.

That was the readiness of the almighty steward, and the minimum courtesy for confronting the Witch.

???: “—Witch.”

Yes, the opponent was a Witch. One who should have already perished and lost any means to interfere with the world.

Now that it had appeared forth once again, as one acquainted with those dark ages, his morality of rights and wrongs was—,

???: “—Hey hey, where are you, bro! Playing hide and seek? How cold!”

The next instant echoed the mighty voice of the youth intimidating and constraining him.

The young man, laughing mockingly, stood on the balcony overlooking the garden, searching for him. The unmistakable presence of evil radiating from his chest made it clear that he was carrying some kind of supernatural Anchor.

Though he wanted to openly highlight that and implore who was the one to blame, he would forfeit any chance of victory upon doing so. Who could ever, possibly meddle with him via words.

For the youth was indeed one of the lead actors of this evening.

For he was the one and only Knight of the silver-haired half-devil who made immense contributions to subjugate great evil threatening the world.

???: “Knight to the Witch of Frost, and a contractor to a Witch of Sin… Distasteful.”

Faced with such outrageous titles, he could only laugh; this was precisely what it meant.

Though unfortunately, he refrained from expressing a smile thirsted of loathsomeness beyond criticality.

???: “I’ve given you company till now. Stop running around like a mouse, and come at me from the front!”

Though he seemed to not have ascertained this side’s position, the youth’s voice sonorously resounded into the air of the chilling night. The will to vexate sojourning his tone, was a substitute for rubbing the opponent in the wrong way.

It shan’t make for an easy escape should he err the significance of the danger which the youth posed.

???: “So, it seems you are not a simple puppet of the Witch. Obstreperous adversary.”

To begin with, the cause behind tonight’s ceremony of conferring honors, the subjugation of the great catastrophes were battle accomplishments the youth had attained regardless of the Witch.

Of course, he was no ordinary individual. —A contractor of the Witch who made full use of her.

???: “Thinking back to it, even in that era, I never experienced meeting an opponent this malevolent. Uncharted.”

Once again, he piled up identical contemplation as before.

Having lived for long, his disposition came to be that he had seen the entirety of the world, but that did not hold true. Neither for people, nor for the world, nor for things other than those, nor for anything or everything.

???: “The future holds bright for the lively, pure world. Blessing.”

Despite the predicament of being cornered, to hold his head high upon thinking of the future was the special privilege of the old.

Concealing his brazen smile with a hand, he took action conforming with his own mission.

???: “—I cannot allow the world to be brought to ruin by the insatiable, unbounded “Greed”. Promise.”

There once lived those, who fought to preserve this world.

Likable people, and correspondingly discordant people, however, the direction they all looked in, and what they all wished for was supposed to be the same.

—As the final one to remember those wishes, he could not possibly give up.

Chapter III:
Accumulating Life in Another World from Zero with a Witch

1

It happened without warning: a sudden, jarring shock that tore through the air.

???: "—Hah."

With a single exhale, Subaru's body crumpled forward, collapsing as though the strength had been drained from him entirely.

No one was there to catch his fall, therefore he tumbled from the platform, rolling helplessly to the ground below.

???: "Subaru—?!"

A scream echoed, sharp and panicked, and in an instant, chaos rippled through the crowd in the wake of this abrupt incident.

He could feel the presence of people rushing toward him and from the platform above, astonished gazes bore down upon him. Subaru's body twitched uncontrollably, limbs spasming like a dying insect.

—Nay, not like an insect on the verge of death. Like one already doomed.

He knew the feeling all too well. The familiar touch of Death crept up behind him, wearing a thin smile, already resting its hand on his shoulder.

???: "Subaru! S-Someone! Please, somebody! Help!"

???: "Ferris, hurry! Get over here!!"

Hands grabbed his shoulders, pulling him upright. The moment he was turned over, blood exploded from his mouth, a violent torrent.

It sounded akin to one's submerged head breaking the surface of a bath. It was blood. A whole bucket's worth. Far too much for a human body to hold. Something inside him had ruptured violently and irreparably.

Someone nearby gasped, and he could see the large, heavy tears brimming in her eyes.

The sight pierced his heart, and it ached. He regretted it deeply, knowing that he had made her cry.

Because of Natsuki Subaru's pitiful, miserable death, he had once again forced that sorrowful expression onto her face.

Echidna: "If you are going to die anyway, would you rather do it where no one can see you?"

The room erupted into a cacophony of shouts and cries; but, amid the uproar, a calm, cutting, almost penetrating voice reached his ears with stark clarity.

It was like it had come from a world entirely separate from this one. —No, not "as though." It was from another world. That was the truth.

The cold black stone at his chest hummed with that voice as Subaru felt the warm waves of healing magic flow through him. Yet, deep down, he knew it was all in vain.

There was no mistaking it; the sensation of Death had a singular, unmistakable presence.

He understood now, without question. He was dying. And once he accepted that, only one thought remained—

Subaru: "Wh-Who…"

—Who was it? Who had killed Natsuki Subaru?

2

???: "Myon myon myon myon myon…"

???: "…"

A slow, carefree voice drifted across the breeze, carrying over the green expanse of the grasslands.

This familiar, almost prank-like ritual repeated itself with such diligence that it seemed a necessary step for the inheritance of Memories.

Then again, it could very well be her way of messing with Subaru, dragging this on and on.

Subaru: "If that's the case, your pettiness has reached new heights."

???: "Myon… oh, do you still doubt me? No matter how much time has passed in the real world, we have been together for a while now, have we not? Is it not about time you started trusting me completely?"

Subaru: "Trust you completely…? What, did I bash my head in or something?"

Pointing to his head, Subaru grimaced dramatically. Hearing his response, the Witch— Echidna puffed her cheeks in exaggerated displeasure.

It was a pouting face Subaru had grown accustomed to. As annoying as it was to admit, Echidna was not wrong. She had become a constant presence in Subaru's life in terms of time spent together.

At least enough to say that, in this other world, hers was the face he had seen more than anyone else's.

Subaru: "For someone I've been with for so long, you still make me feel like I can't put my guard down around you. You're quite one hell of a woman."

Echidna: "Oh? Hehe, it does not feel so bad being treated like a girl, you know."

Subaru: "If that's what you call being treated like a girl, you've got a long way to go.”

Watching Echidna deflate as the air left her puffed-up cheeks, Subaru sighed deeply.

Then, leaning forward weakly, he slumped onto the table before Echidna. Collapsing carelessly over the objects on the table, naturally, he knocked over the cups and tea cakes.

As she watched them tumble under the table, Echidna, closing one eye,

Echidna: “You are so rude. Even if I can conjure these things whenever I wish, it does not feel good to have my hospitality so thoroughly slighted.”

Subaru: “Think of it as an art form that expresses my utterly crushed spirit.”

Echidna: “Calling a simple tantrum art? Picasso or Van Gogh would be furious with you, you know?”

Echidna teased him, referencing great artists from Subaru’s knowledge. Subaru, not bothering to respond, tilted his head to the side.

Echidna: “This is serious. That being said, I do feel sorry for you. —Still, it has only been a month.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “One month since you dealt with the Sanctuary and the mansion, and made a Contract with me… and now, you are wrapped up in yet another Death. It really is a kind of talent, would you not say?”

Subaru: “Talent? What kind of talent is that? The talent to die? I’ll murder your ass!”

Echidna: “Oh my, so scary.”

Subaru cradled his head in his hands while the Witch, lying sideways in his view, gave a mocking shrug of fear.

Sighing deeply at her usual attitude, Subaru slowly pushed himself upright.

Then—

Echidna: “It seems you are done venting. So—”

Subaru: “A snap of your fingers to replenish the Dona tea and cakes. Ahh, I know. I know.”

Looking exasperated, Subaru grabbed the newly-appeared cup. Gulping it down in one go, he then stuffed some cakes into his mouth as if to clear the taste.

Both the tea and cakes were Echidna’s creations. There was probably no real difference between them, but liquid and solid forms somehow felt distinct in his mind. It was all psychological.

He had to keep this mindset, or the weight of the situation would crush him.

Echidna: “Nevertheless, being killed in front of a crowd like that; it was quite a bold move.”

Subaru: “…Yeah, I was completely caught off guard. But, isn’t it natural to let your guard down sometimes?”

Responding to Echidna as she broached the main topic, Subaru reflected on what had happened to him.

—The ceremony was meant to commend those who had defeated two of the great threats to the world: the White Whale, and the Sin Archbishop of Sloth.

That prestigious event had been the stage for Subaru’s newest Death.

The Crusch Camp, the Anastasia Camp, and naturally, the Emilia Camp, including Subaru, were all gathered. Nobles and high-ranking officials of the Kingdom were present as well. It was a high-class, formal affair.

How could he have possibly expected to be killed in such a setting with all eyes filed upon him?

Echidna: “In fact, it was your grand debut as the Knight of your beloved. I was hoping it would go smoothly, considering how much time I spent helping you with etiquette…”

Subaru: “Yet you can’t hide that smirk on your face. You’re enjoying this, aren’t you?”

Echidna: “—. Do not get the wrong idea. I am not wishing for your death. I simply cannot suppress my overflowing curiosity about the unknown.”

Subaru: “They say only fools learn through death, but I guess not even death has cured your nosiness.”

Echidna offered a feeble excuse, but Subaru deliberately chose words he knew would annoy and irritate her.

For someone who openly claimed to be driven by curiosity and a thirst for knowledge, she sure hated being called a busybody. Then again, Subaru would probably hate being called a veteran of death, so perhaps it was mutual.

In any case—

Echidna: “—This is the start of another Death loop.”

And so, Echidna clearly confronted him with words about a reality that was hard to deny.

Subaru could not look away as he violently scratched his head,

Subaru: “I don’t like that term, “Death loop”. It sounds too much like something from a game or a manga and makes it less serious.”

Echidna: “I think it is convenient and easy to understand… but, I will stop if you really hate it.”

Nodding at Subaru's complaint, Echidna added a casual "Well then" and continued,

Echidna: "Now, about this Death that struck you in such a situation… this time, the cause was almost instantaneous."

Subaru: "…It was when I was about to say something on the platform."

The ceremony proceeded solemnly, and while Wilhelm and Julius received first and second honors for their achievements in slaying the White Whale and the Sin Archbishop of Sloth, respectively, Subaru was awarded the third honor.

This was recognition of his achievements, second only to the two who directly had taken down the main enemies; it was even more so than that of Crusch, who had led the forces, or of Anastasia, who had provided military cooperation.

Subaru felt quite embarrassed by being awarded the third honor ahead of the Royal Candidates, but Crusch and Anastasia acknowledged Subaru's efforts and achievements, and Wilhelm and the others respected that judgment.

Having taken the position of Emilia's Knight, Subaru himself wanted at least some form of distinction. So, he humbly accepted their goodwill and gratefully received the third honor.

As a result, Subaru, who had been called up to the stage, received words of praise for his achievements from a representative of the Council of Wise Men, who spoke on behalf of the absent King.

And then—

Echidna: "Just as you turned to face them, you collapsed and departed, never to return."

Subaru: "Watch how you say that…! Weren't you able to tell what happened, either?"

Grimacing at her matter-of-fact tone, Subaru flicked the Magic Crystal hanging from his neck.

As their Contract deepened, Echidna gained the ability to share real-time information with Subaru outside of the tea party. He found it annoying when she constantly talked to him, but her perspective was invaluable in situations like this.

Subaru asked with that hope in mind, and Echidna shrugged,

Echidna: “Sorry that I cannot meet your expectations, but I did not pick up on anything.”

Subaru: “You useless, blabbermouth Witch…”

Echidna: “Yes, I cannot deny that one this time. Honestly, the most likely cause seems like sudden death… Although, I just had a thought: what if it was a chronic condition, like a heart attack? What would we do then?”

Subaru: “…Guess I’d just have to hope that my starting point for Return by Death takes me back far enough to improve my lifestyle.”

There was not much else Subaru could say to her blunt concern.

As Echidna had suggested, Return by Death probably could not do much against natural causes of death such as illness. After all, even the strongest warrior race in the universe could not defeat something like heart disease.

Subaru: “So basically, I need to eat my veggies if I don’t want to drop dead.”

Echidna: “At least you are reflecting on your daily habits. Now, let us talk about the parts of this that are worse.”

Clapping her hands in front of her chest, Echidna steered the conversation to the real issue.

Switching topics with a clap was a routine part of his interactions with Echidna. Subaru followed her lead, replaying the events in his mind to sort through his thoughts.

There was no denying the lack of information, but some facts could still be inferred from the current clues.

For example, the cause of Subaru's Death.

Subaru: "…Was it magic, or maybe poison?"

Echidna: "It could be. I did not sense any magic being used, so that is unlikely. But if it was poison, there is no way I could have known."

Subaru: "You weren't on full alert for magic either, were you?"

Echidna: "Well… no, I was not. I suppose if a pro assassin had been hired, it is not impossible that they could have slipped past my watch."

Subaru: "An assassin…"

Hearing that word, Subaru's face twisted into a scowl.

After all, it had not even been a month in real time since he had managed to fend off an attack from a pair of assassins. Fully aware of his situation, Echidna quickly realized the reason behind Subaru's distaste.

Echidna: "I understand how you feel. But right now, you are a person of public interest. You were one of the stars of this ceremony… it would not be surprising if someone sent an assassin after you."

Subaru: "That's…"

Echidna: "Of course, it is also possible that the Witch Cult is behind it. In this case, you might find it more reassuring if your enemies are cultists."

Subaru: "It's kind of messed up that I'd feel better thinking it's an act of terror by the Witch Cult than suspecting Crusch-san or Anastasia-san of trying to have me killed."

Subaru furrowed his brow as Echidna offered a faint smile with her words.

To say that it would be preferable to face off against the Witch Cult rather than accuse political allies was something anyone would think to be insane. But perhaps the only one who could understand that feeling was Echidna.

Echidna: “But, surely there is reason for suspicion? The two you mentioned are also rival candidates in the Royal Selection. They have more than enough motive to send an assassin after you.”

Subaru: “Maybe. But after being targeted by someone I thought was like family, I’m not about to start buying into every logical argument.”

Echidna: “Hmm, a sound argument, but still… Roswaal truly complicates things.”

Echidna groaned, knowing that Roswaal’s involvement made for a strong counterpoint, but there was no point in prolonging unfounded suspicions any longer.

At the absurd idea that Crusch or Anastasia would target Subaru,

Subaru: “Clearing those doubts quickly is the smart move. Then we can have a more constructive discussion.”

Echidna: “Oh, feeling confident, are we? Do you have a brilliant plan in mind?”

Subaru: “You’re not gonna like it if I tell you it’s the boring way.”

Without much fanfare, Echidna tilted her head as Subaru calmly laid out his thoughts.

She clearly preferred seeing Subaru running in circles, but he was not naive enough to cater to her whims or to sell his life cheaply.

Even if he had infinite attempts, wasting them accreting meaningless Deaths would be absurd.

Subaru: “Simply put, I should surprise Crusch-san and Anastasia-san with a direct question. If I suddenly ask them, “Are you the one who’s trying to kill me?”, they’d be quite rattled, right?”

Echidna: “Hohoh, I see.”

Subaru: “And anyway, if I’m going to suspect anyone, it’d only be Anastasia-san. I don’t think Crusch-san can scheme like that in her current state.”

Crusch, who was the victim of having her Memories stolen, was still reeling. Though she was present at the ceremony, Subaru doubted she was fully aware of her position or surroundings. If she had already begun maneuvering behind the scenes to eliminate political rivals, then her aptitude for politics would be truly terrifying.

As for Anastasia, it seemed unlikely for her to be the mastermind.

Subaru: “I don’t think she’d intentionally tarnish her camp’s reputation by pulling something like this during the ceremony. And killing me in front of everyone would only risk undermining her accomplishments.”

Echidna: “Hmm, a logical answer. I have nothing to add.”

Subaru: “Just how many times do you think I’ve died so far? I’ve learned to think things through a bit.”

In response to Echidna’s words, Subaru tapped his head with his finger.

It was not something to boast about, just a simple fact.

Return by Death did not accumulate physical experiences, but the mental scars stacked up with every attempt.

No matter how many times he experienced Death, the helplessness, the overwhelming loss, never dulled. And the pain, he would never get used to that; but—

Subaru: “—The fear of it has definitely faded. That, too.”

Echidna: “Oh, you are making me blush, saying it is all thanks to me.”

Subaru: “I didn’t say that.”

Subaru clicked his tongue, annoyed by Echidna's coy smile.

In truth, he had not said it. He had not, but he could not deny it internally.

Without Echidna, Subaru doubted he would have maintained his sanity through the many times he had already endured Return by Death.

Of course, he had no intention of voicing any gratitude for that.

Subaru: "Anyway, that's why I don't suspect the two camps."

Echidna: "Then, what about the two camps who were not present at the ceremony? The candidates not involved in this commendation might have had reasons to make a move here, correct?"

Subaru: "…I don't know about Priscilla, but Felt and Reinhard wouldn't do it."

Pressured by Echidna's persistent questioning, Subaru replied in a lower tone.

He did not have a particularly deep connection with Felt or Reinhard. It was by mere chance that they had helped him escape his first Death on the day he was summoned to this other world.

But, in that short time, he had come to trust them. Felt was not the type to tolerate underhanded tactics, and Reinhard was the picture of honesty and integrity.

Subaru: "Even if my last interaction with them wasn't the greatest."

Echidna: "Ah yes, there is that Memory of you driving them away with some harsh words. Maybe they were hurt more than you realize. Is it not possible they would want you dead?"

Subaru: "Come on, I'm not getting assassins sent after me over a temper tantrum."

Besides, if Reinhard wanted to kill Subaru, he would not need to send an assassin. His own skills would allow him to do the job himself in an instant.

Even with the success Subaru had achieved, if Reinhard decided to kill him out of anger, Subaru doubted anyone in the Kingdom would bother to come to his own defense.

Echidna: “At least you have me on your side. That is reassuring, is it not?”

Subaru: “And what could an evil spirit who haunts my head possibly do for me in a court of law?”

Echidna: “Calling me an evil spirit is a bit much!”

In any case, the scenario where Reinhard acted out of anger at Subaru over their last encounter could be dismissed.

In that case, that left Priscilla as the only remaining suspect among the Royal Candidates, but she also seemed unlikely.

Subaru: “This is just a baseless hunch, but Priscilla doesn’t seem like someone who’d go through the trouble of hiring an assassin… if she wanted me dead, she’d come right at me, face-to-face.”

Echidna: “I wonder about that. Based on what I have seen from your Memories, I think she is more of a pragmatist than you give her credit for. If necessary, she might resort to dirty tactics, as any ruler might.”

Subaru: “I don’t think she’s a ruler yet…”

However, Subaru agreed that Priscilla had a regal demeanor, even as a candidate. And he could not completely dismiss the idea that she would use underhanded methods if she deemed them necessary.

Thus, it might be prudent to consider Priscilla or the Witch Cult as immediate potential enemies.

Echidna: “Of course, there is always the possibility that someone trying to gain favor with one of the Royal Candidates got ahead of themselves and decided to take you out, but that would make finding the mastermind much more difficult.”

Subaru: “Stop it! I had thought of that too, but I didn’t dwell on it because it’s too damn depressing!”

Widening the pool of suspects like that would even put Crusch and Anastasia in a dubious light. This was why political strife and internal conflicts were the bane of nations.

Subaru: “Anyway.”

And, Subaru slowly rose to his feet, feeling sufficiently miserable after all these grim thoughts.

Still seated, Echidna widened her eyes and asked, “Leaving already?”

Echidna: “You could stay a bit longer and rest.”

Subaru: “Why bother keeping me here? You can watch the outside world through the Magic Crystal, so you don’t have any reason to be bored.”

Echidna: “It seems you genuinely believe me to be heartless, but I truly do care about you, you know? I am the one who wanted this Contract, after all. Is it not only natural that I would worry when you are about to throw yourself into another fight so soon?”

Subaru: “You always catch me off guard when you say things like that.”

Echidna puffed her cheeks in mild frustration at Subaru’s flippant tone, but he merely shrugged.

A door appeared down the hill, one that opened to the outside world, signaling the moment to leave this dreamlike castle and return to reality. Reality— that is, the very moment Subaru, who had just lost his life, would return to.

Echidna: “So, what is your next move?”

As she asked this to his retreating back, Subaru waved his hand without looking back.

There was no clear, immediate solution to figuring out who had killed him or how it had happened.

So—

Subaru: “For now, I’ll just get killed a few more times, and see if I can piece things together.”

He had no intention of wasting his life carelessly, and he certainly did not want to contribute to the accretion of meaningless Deaths.

Yet, if necessary, he would sell his life and accrete Deaths without hesitation.

For Natsuki Subaru’s soul had already been sold to the Witch of Greed.

3

Subaru: “—Is it you, Crusch-san? Are you the one who’s trying to kill me?”

Crusch: “Excuse me, what are you talking about, Natsuki Subaru-sama? I have been told you are my benefactor. Even with my lost memories, I would never think of repaying kindness with treachery.”

Subaru: “—Is it you, Anastasia-san? Are you the one who’s trying to kill me?”

Anastasia: “Huh? What’s goin’ on that you’d say somethin’ like that outta nowhere? Are ya feelin’ like you’re bein’ threatened or somethin’? If so, ya can consult with me.”

Subaru: “—Is it you again, Roswaal? Are you the one who’s trying to kill me?”

Roswaal: “Myyy~, my, that is quite the harsh statement, Subaru-sama. There is no longer any reason for me to test you like before. You know that quite well, don’t you?”

Subaru: “What do you think?”

Having gathered responses from those he wanted to clear suspicions from, and those he needed to clear suspicions from as well, Subaru stood at the corner of the commendation ceremony and silently directed his question toward the Magic Crystal hanging from his neck.

In response to Subaru's question, the inhuman Magic Crystal emitted a dull glow,

Echidna: "Roughly the same impression just as you would expect. Some were startled, some laughed it off as a joke, others smirked knowingly… well, there did not seem to be anything too revealing."

Subaru: "True."

Subaru gently rubbed his chin, mentally conversing with the voice that resonated inside his head.

He was communicating with Echidna, who dwelled within the Magic Crystal. They communicated without words, their conversations flowing telepathically if put simply, a method that had become invaluable for resolving issues.

That said, during more peaceful times, Subaru often found himself at the mercy of her endless small talk, which frequently left him frustrated.

Subaru: "Still, this is where you come in handy… For now, it seems none of them are the mastermind."

Echidna: "That, or they are just so skilled at hiding their true feelings that even a little prodding would not make them flinch."

Subaru: "If I start doubting them like that, it will never end."

If Subaru assumed his opponent was always one or two steps ahead, trying to uncover their plot would seem utterly foolish. It was a pathetic conversation between him and the Witch, both racking their brains and getting nowhere.

After all, he had already died three times, all for the sake of extracting fresh reactions from each suspect. At the very least, he wanted to cross them off the list for good.

—The time was the opening of the commendation ceremony, and Subaru's Return by Death had set its starting point here.

At worst, there had been a possibility that he would have been sent back several days before the ceremony, so finding the save point much closer than expected brought a sense of relief.

Echidna: "Having a few more days would have made it easier to prepare, would it not?"

Subaru: "If I had prepared too much, they might have called off the attack altogether. If that had happened, the culprit would have slipped away, and that would be much more troublesome"

Echidna: "I see. Easier to smoke them out if you know where they will be and whom they are targeting."

Subaru: "The last thing I want is for them to escape, and for the target to shift from me to Emilia and the others."

For that reason, Subaru would ensure that whoever was after him would be dealt with here and now.

Thanks to Echidna's assistance, he had successfully utilized Return by Death, but the conditions for updating Return by Death's checkpoint remained unknown as ever. The hypothesis was that it was only after overcoming the difficulties that befell Subaru, but that too was not certain.

More importantly, if someone other than Subaru were to get hurt, there was a strong possibility that his Authority, Return by Death, would not allow him to save them, just as it had failed to save the now comatose Rem.

Subaru: "So, I'll make sure to finish off the enemy who's been killing me right when they do it."

Echidna: "A strange way of putting it, but I understand. —So, shall we proceed according to plan?"

Subaru: “Yeah. It’s all on you. Show me I can trust you.”

Echidna: “Huh, so you still do not trust me…”

Unknowingly wounded by a matter entirely separate from the main issue, Echidna reacted subtly. Ignoring her response, Subaru withdrew his consciousness from the Magic Crystal and shifted his attention back to the lively hall.

He heard a voice akin to a silver bell, summoning him toward the line of people awaiting their commendations. Subaru smiled back at the girl beside him, who gently spoke to him. Her nervousness increased as they awaited the announcement of who would be honored for their contributions.

Of course, Subaru already knew the details of the ceremony. He also knew its conclusion.

As a result, there was no tension and no sense of anticipation for him. If there was any emotion stirring within him, it would be the simple wish to avoid seeing the girl beside him, hopeful for Subaru’s merits to be recognized, ending up with a sad expression on her face.

However—

Echidna: “If circumstances were to change, it could shake the foundation of our analysis, so you mustn’t overlook that.”

The warning was one Subaru already knew well, and he wrinkled his nose in irritation. That very nose was then playfully poked by the girl beside him as she told him to stop.

???: “—Now, we shall begin the commendation ceremony for the defeat of the White Whale and the Witch Cult’s Sin Archbishop!”

The one who swiftly controlled the restless atmosphere of the venue was a man of imposing stature, clad in armor: the captain of the Royal Guard, who had also facilitated the announcement of the Royal Selection.

Wilhelm’s name was called first, commending him for his significant contribution in defeating the White Whale.

It was clear, however, that he was not in a state to fully appreciate the praise. His mind was weighed down by the condition of his lord, Crusch, and the old wound on his shoulder that would not heal. Subaru, too, could not help but wish to alleviate the cause of Wilhelm's suffering.

Next, Julius was summoned to receive the second-highest honor for his role in defeating the Sin Archbishop of Sloth. The ceremony continued, and soon, in a deep and authoritative voice, Subaru's name was called to the stage to receive the third commendation.

With a gentle push from the girl beside him, who was overwhelmed with emotion, Subaru ascended the stage. There, his achievements were acknowledged by one of the Council of Wise Men's elders, a man whose beard and eyebrows were far too long, and after he offered him words of praise—

Subaru: "—Blergh!"

Without warning, just like before, Subaru coughed up blood and collapsed, dead.

4

Echidna: "I have finally confirmed something about the cause of your death. —It was not any kind of magic."

Even though Subaru could not see her face, her smug tone through the Magic Crystal made it easy to imagine her proud look.

Subaru, however, was not entirely convinced that this was information worth boasting about. Considering the dozens of times he had died just to figure out the cause of his Death, it felt like a rather underwhelming revelation.

Subaru: "If it wasn't magic, then what was it? Poison? A curse? I've already matched the faces and names of those who might have touched me during the ceremony."

Echidna: "If we are dealing with a Curse Arts User, that would most certainly be a solid strategy. Usually, there is no saving you the moment they touch you, but your case is an exception. However…”

Subaru: “However?”

Echidna: “This time, that was a wasted effort. It was not Curse Arts, nor was it poison.”

Her tone was so full of confidence that Subaru found himself listening intently.

With magic, Curse Arts, and poison off the table, Subaru felt utterly stumped. But, perhaps there was a technique in this world that he still had no knowledge of.

Echidna: “There is an unusual technique called the Flow Method. Even those without talent can use it, but it requires hellish training.”

Subaru: “I see. Sounds like something you wouldn’t casually ask to learn. But, never mind that.”

In fact, there did seem to be techniques he was unfamiliar with, but they were unlikely to be something he could learn on the spot, nor would they suit him anyway.

Instead, Subaru redirected the conversation back to the main issue, and after a brief pause, Echidna added—

Echidna: “Judging by the number of attempts you’ve accreted, it is safe to say an Authority is what took you out.”

Subaru: “An Authority… so, that means it was the Witch Cult, then?”

Echidna: “Exactly. Whoever did this to you must be someone on the level of a Sin Archbishop. Authorities stem from Witch Factors… and there is a pattern of sharing them with their Apostles.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna’s voice carried an air of quiet intensity as she explained.

To someone who claimed to be the world's foremost expert on magic, the Authorities wielded by the Sin Archbishops must have been an irresistible object of fascination— or, simply put, the perfect additions to her collection, driven by her insatiable Greed.

Ignoring her peculiar inclinations, Subaru scanned the venue, observing the crowd of attendees.

Thinking that one of the Witch Cult's Sin Archbishops could be hidden among them—

Subaru: "…Could it be Gluttony?"

Swallowing hard, Subaru felt a mixture of faint unease and growing anticipation rising in his throat.

Subaru figured that if anyone in the world would welcome the arrival of a Sin Archbishop, it would likely only be himself, Wilhelm, and possibly Ferris.

If the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony was truly present here, it would be like a moth flying straight into the flame.

It would be the perfect opportunity to make him pay for the devastation he had caused, and reclaim what he had stolen.

Echidna: "If it is truly the one you are hoping for…"

Subaru: "Then it's obvious. —I'll take Rem back."

Clenching his fist, Subaru spoke out the unwavering resolve that had taken root deep within him.

Even now, Rem, who had both her Name and Memories stolen, remained trapped in her endless sleep. The desire to bring her back was one of the main reasons Subaru had decided to make a Contract with Echidna.

If the enemy truly was the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, it would be the jackpot he had been waiting for. Even if it turned out not to be him, they would at least gain a lead on the whereabouts of that monster and his detestable mouth.

Subaru: “So, how do we identify the Sin Archbishop?”

Echidna: “Well, that is the problem.”

Subaru: “…The problem?”

Contrary to Subaru’s steely resolve, Echidna’s response was casual and light. A bad feeling crept over Subaru, and as he furrowed his brow, the voice in his head continued with an ominous, “Actually,”

Echidna: “Normally, a Witch… ah, right, we are dealing with a Sin Archbishop here. Normally, a Sin Archbishop would be surrounded by Miasma. It should make them easy to spot.”

Subaru: “Miasma… so, I’m the problem?”

Echidna: “Sadly, you are correct. Due to all your accreted deaths and use of your Authority, your Miasma is now so thick it is practically drowning the entire venue, concealing any Sin Archbishop who might be present.”

The cruel irony of the situation left Subaru unable to blame Echidna.

Subaru saw this as a consequence of his decision to fully leverage Return by Death. Even if he had known about it beforehand, the option of not using it was never on the table.

Subaru: “No point in regretting what’s already done. So, what should I do now?”

Echidna: “It will take a slightly unusual approach, like… a human wave attack.”

Subaru was momentarily confused by Echidna’s suggestion, but the answer soon became apparent.

Echidna’s description was apt: an unusual human wave attack, indeed.

Subaru: “There must be at least… what, four or five hundred people here?”

Echidna: “Then, even if you are hopelessly unlucky, it should only take five hundred tries.”

She said it so nonchalantly, and Subaru had plenty of things he wanted to snap back with, like how there was no way he could be that unlucky, but he held his tongue.

After all, it was not like he could boast about having any luck.

5

Easily swayed by the Witch’s sweet words, Subaru’s chosen strategy was a simple one.

In essence, it was the same tactic he had used on Crusch, Anastasia, and even Roswaal— approaching people randomly and asking, “Are you a Sin Archbishop?”

Ideally, he would have preferred to ask multiple people as a joke in one go, but Subaru quickly learned just how much the Sin Archbishops were despised in this world.

In most cases, just mentioning the term caused intense tension, and the moment Subaru threw accusations of being a Sin Archbishop, his targets would become deeply agitated.

At first, he had hoped that their reactions were signs of having been identified as a Sin Archbishop, but—

Echidna: “You are one of the most renowned Witch Cult hunters, having defeated a Sin Archbishop. If someone like you were to suspect one of being a Sin Archbishop, they would deny it with everything they have.”

And so, Echidna’s reminder prompted Subaru to reconsider his approach and the need to be more careful in how he phrased his questions.

And so, accreting more retries, Subaru meticulously questioned each participant in the ceremony. Frankly, reaching five hundred attempts was the worst-case scenario, and he had expected to find the answer in far fewer attempts.

However, reality was unforgiving to Subaru, as the number of trials exceeded four hundred, pushing relentlessly toward the dreaded five hundred mark.

Subaru, however, had his justifications.

Naturally, in this kind of operation, he started by targeting people whose backgrounds were unknown or suspicious.

In this case, unknown meant people with whom Subaru had little to no personal connection.

He first questioned unfamiliar faces, other factions' supporters, and the ceremony staff. When that yielded no results, he moved on to the next stage: targeting individuals from other camps and people he knew by name.

Honestly, this was little more than a precautionary measure. He did not expect to find the culprit here, but once he had started, he had to see it through.

That was all there was to it. And yet—

???: "—Why would you think such a thing? Unfathomable."

The response he got from one particular person sparked something strange within Subaru.

Even in hindsight, he could not quite understand why that answer lingered in his mind. Some had misunderstood his intentions, and others had asked him similar questions.

And yet, for some reason, this person stood out to him in a way the others had not, though he could not explain why.

So, to get to the bottom of it—

Subaru: "Are you a sin Archbishop?" "Are you familiar with the word "Gluttony"?" "Do you happen to be a spy from one of the Camps?" "What do you cherish?" "Who's your family?" "Where are you from? "If you were to be an animal, what would you be?" "Does hearing the word Witch delight you?" "Do you know about

Petelgeuse?” “What do you think of Petelgeuse?” “Shall we talk together about Echidna?” “Where did you meet Roswaal?” “Aren’t you frightened of the Silver Haired Half Elf?” “E.M.T.” “What do you think about betraying?” “What do you value?” “Do you like money?” “What do you like?” “How are you doing?” “Did you get a haircut?” “You’re trying to kill me, aren’t you?”

He fired off his questions relentlessly, and he deliberately took to the stage for the final round.

The wise elder with the long white beard presented him with the commendation, and asked him to say a few words. Normally, this was the point where Subaru would turn and be killed by “something.”

But, as Subaru turned around this time, nothing unusual happened to his chest. He took a step forward, looking down at the people waiting for his words, and spotted a face in the corner of the venue.

And, Subaru smiled at the person who had been watching him all along—

Subaru: “—You are my enemy, Clind.”

6

—Subaru knew shockingly little about the blue-haired man called Clind.

Technically, Clind was a member of the Emilia faction— though strictly speaking, it was because his master, Annerose Miload, was a branch of the Mathers family, thus aligning him with their camp.

That said, he had known Roswaal’s maids, like Ram and Frederica, for quite some time, and even Emilia was familiar with him. In other words, he seemed to have a deeper connection to Roswaal than even his own master, Annerose.

That was precisely why Subaru had postponed questioning him. In hindsight, this was a mistake that had needlessly increased the number of attempts.

Subaru continued questioning every last participant just to be sure, but Clind was the only one who had raised any alarm for both him and the soul bound to his mind.

In other words, Clind was likely involved with the inner workings of the Witch Cult and wielded an Authority—

Echidna: “Of course, just because someone has a Witch Factor does not necessarily make them part of the Witch Cult. My friends and I were not, for example.”

Subaru: “But, you guys were just as dangerous as them, right?”

Echidna: “Well, yes, each of us almost destroyed the world at least once…”

Echidna, the wicked soul, spoke as if it were no big deal, but if someone had nearly wiped out the world even once, they should absolutely be classified as a threat.

Setting aside Echidna’s skewed sense of reality, Subaru refocused on how to deal with Clind.

Subaru: “So, we know Clind is using an Authority to kill me, but what exactly is it?”

Echidna: “I do not know. The effects of each Authority vary from one person to another. I am sure even the current Greed manifests an Authority different from mine.”

Subaru: “So, he could be using invisible hands to kill me, like Petelgeuse?”

Petelgeuse’s Unseen Hand had indeed allowed him to commit such acts. Subaru had been lucky to see them early on, but had they remained invisible, it would have been a nightmare to deal with.

Much like back then, this battle would start with uncovering the nature of his opponent’s Authority.

Subaru: “Got any leads on how he’s killing me?”

Echidna: “I have a few ideas. From what I have seen, your heart is being destroyed while you are on the stage. So, invisible hands are definitely a possibility, though using something similar to Petelgeuse would be boring.”

Subaru: “This isn’t a manga serialization meeting. We don’t get to choose abilities based on how interesting they are.”

It was incredibly versatile and hard to defend against. Unseen Hand was an outstanding ability in that regard. It would be a terrifying threat if multiple people could wield such power.

On top of that, Petelgeuse had the resilience typical of Evil Spirits, making him incredibly hard to kill. Even now, thinking back on it, he was a formidable foe, one Subaru would never want to face again.

Echidna: “But even so, you cannot back down if you are against a Sin Archbishop.”

Subaru: “—. Sin Archbishop or not, I’ll crush anyone who lays a hand on my own people.”

Echidna: “Ohhh, so scary. And the worst part is, I know you mean it.”

Subaru could almost imagine the unseen Echidna shrugging at his response. His exchange with the Witch felt so natural that, without missing a beat, Subaru began planning his next move to deal with Clind.

At the very least, so long as he knew that Clind would make his move while he was on the stage—

Echidna: “Where will you start?”

Subaru: “Isn’t it obvious?”

The excitement in Echidna’s voice was barely concealed, as if she were anticipating the unraveling of the unknown.

The Witch’s inappropriate eagerness was oddly reassuring to Subaru. With that thought in mind, he closed one eye.

Subaru: “—Gathering intel. If you know the enemy and know yourself, you need not fear the result of a hundred battles”

Echidna: “I doubt Sun Tzu considered that in order to avoid danger in a hundred battles, one might have to lose hundreds of times first.”

Subaru smiled at Echidna’s wry remark, and said “That’s a fair point.”

7

???: “Clind, is it? Yes, I see. He has been serving the Master for many years, and now, on the Master’s orders, he is working as Annerose-sama’s steward.”

???: “As per the Master, most of the Mathers household servants are trained by Clind. Embarrassing as it is, even I learned the basics of being a maid from him.”

???: “Skilled, versatile, the perfect steward… There’s no end to the praise for Clind. His abilities as a steward are truly unmatched, and I still feel ashamed of how much I have to learn. But…”

???: “But, as a person, he is far from admirable. Some might mistake him for a devoted, caring teacher… but, it is all just superficial.”

???: “His true nature is that of a beast who blatantly favors the young. Once someone grows up a bit, he loses interest. I, too, was treated horribly…”

???: “Subaru-sama, you need to be careful. Not for yourself, Subaru-sama, but for Emilia-sama. She may look mature, but emotionally, she is still very much a child…”

???: “Clind’s focus is not swayed by looks or actual age. He claims to see the soul or whatever; anyway, that’s how it is!”

????: “Concerning Clind…? Once again, you are stirring up unnecessary trouble before a big event.”

????: “You will be called up to the stage when the award ceremony starts. Stay quiet until then. If you mess up during the ceremony, no one will be able to bail you out.”

????: “…You want to chat to calm your nerves? You would be better off talking to Emilia-sama if that’s the case. And of all things, you choose to talk about Clind?”

????: “—. No, it’s fine. This is Barusu we’re talking about, after all. There must be some meaning behind it. Rather, if there isn’t, Ram would be surprised. And despise you for it.”

????: “Clind is Roswaal-sama’s steward. He can handle most tasks single-handedly, and he is incredibly skilled. He has never been seen breaking a sweat.”

????: “He is currently serving under Annerose-sama, and is particularly attached to that young mistress… He has a soft spot for children. He used to dote on Ram quite a bit… And on Rem too, surely.”

????: “If that girl is Ram’s sister, she naturally must have also had interactions with Clind, right? Well, that doesn’t matter now since that has all been forgotten. Back to the matter of Clind.”

????: “As for how long he has served Roswaal-sama, even Ram does not know. It’s said that their relationship goes back quite far, so you should ask Roswaal-sama directly.”

????: “…Not quite sure what your intentions are, but Ram would avoid quarrels with Clind. It’s not a matter of strength or weakness. He is just impossible to figure out.”

?????: “Curious about Clind? Oh, that’s an eaaasy~ request. He and I have known each other for quite a long time. I’m sure there’s plenty I could teeell~ you.”

?????: “To begin with, he’s serving Annerose on my orders. Annerose is, after all, a candidate to become the next Roswaal, you seeeee~. I needed some insurance to keep “her” safe.”

?????: “I’ve made a Contract with him. So long as it does not interfere with his duties, he is contracted to protect my assets. Annerose is considered one of those assets.”

?????: “Compensation for the Contract, you ask? Oh, that was settled long ago. Yes, it was a joint effort to defeat a certain enemy. It was an old nemesis of mine, so the timing was quite convenient.”

?????: “Ever since, Clind has been faithfully keeping up his end of the Contract. Althoooough∼, I doubt he expected to accompany me for this looong∼.”

?????: “He is exceedingly principled, you see. He could have walked away the moment the generation he had made the promise to had passed on. It seems that being able to see souls makes him a bit rigid in his ways.”

?????: “As for any weaknesses… I can’t say I’ve come across any. If I had to name one, it would be his particular attachment to Annerose. Not just out of duty as a servant to a master, but out of fondness.”

?????: “It is nothing romantic, mind you. He’s just drawn to her nature. There’s a brilliance within her… a purity and innocence he can never have. And that, I believe, is what keeps him tied to the world of the living.”

8

???: “—Subaru-sama, do you have a moment? Time.”

Just as Subaru searched for the person he wanted to find, the person in question called out to him.

Subaru turned around to find a slender-faced figure in a butler’s uniform standing before him. He had neatly-cut dark blue hair, a monocle adorning a sharp eye, and the kind of handsome, upright bearing that one would expect to see in a painting; yet, strangely, his presence felt faint.

When Subaru had asked him about it before, he had explained that a servant should not stand out in front of others.

It was certainly a fearsome skill if he could consciously erase his presence like that. But for now, that did not matter.

Subaru: “Sure, no problem, Clind-san. I have lots of time to kill.”

Clind: “Killing time, you say? How humble. Today, Subaru-sama is one of the main guests of honor… surely, no one would leave you alone. Busy.”

Subaru: “Well, it’s more like everyone’s being considerate of me, so I’m left sitting quietly in a corner. Ram even scolded me for acting like a kid.”

Clind: “I see. That sounds typical of her. Immutable.”

At the edge of the venue, Subaru shrugged his shoulders in his unfamiliar formal attire while Clind gave a soft smile.

Clind had always given the impression of being expressionless, but while his reactions were subtle, he did in fact display emotions. Subaru had assumed that being an exemplary butler meant remaining composed, and by extension, emotionless, but this had proven to be a misconception.

Clind: “Subaru-sama? Puzzled.”

Subaru: “Ah, sorry. I was lost in thought for a moment… this is the first time we’ve really had a proper conversation, Clind-san.”

Clind: “Regarding that, I apologize for the belated greeting. I should have been visiting the Mathers’s main estate more frequently… Reflection.”

Subaru: “Yeah, and I would’ve loved to help out with the cleanup after the Witchbeasts wrecked the place, but I had some business to take care of.”

Clind: “—Business?”

Clind murmured, narrowing the eye behind his monocle. For a brief moment, Subaru caught a glimpse of something predatory, a hawk-like sharpness in Clind’s gaze, and it made him involuntarily wince.

At the same time, Subaru could not help but mock his own acting ability as they continued this shallow conversation.

At some point, he had developed the ability to hide his true feelings, even when he knew what the other person was plotting.

Even if something unexpected were to happen, so long as it led to Subaru's Death, there would always be a chance to correct it. — Thus, he had grown harder to shake.

Echidna: "That is why you managed to keep it together even when you found out someone who was half a friend was an enemy."

Echidna's commentary on Subaru's thoughts chimed in like clockwork in his mind.

At this point, perhaps discerning between her helpful advice and useless chatter had become a skill unto itself.

Clind: "Subaru-sama, concerning the other day…"

Subaru: "Yeah?"

Clind: "Where were you while Emilia-sama and the Master stayed at our residence… at Annerose-sama's Miload mansion? Inquiry."

Subaru: "Where was I…"

Clind raised a finger, asking the question with a casual air. But, Subaru knew the innocuous tone belied the suspicion behind Clind's question.

He was referring to the time after Subaru had simultaneously resolved the problems at the Sanctuary and the mansion: when the Mathers Estate had been ravaged by the Witchbeasts' attack, and had been temporarily relocated to the Miload Estate. Though the entire affair had lasted fewer than ten days, unlike Emilia and the others who were at Annerose's mansion, Subaru had been absent most of that time due to another task.

That other task, of course, was—

Echidna: "—Preparing to take me out of the tomb, right?."

Exactly as Echidna's voice confirmed in his head, that was the reason he had acted separately.

Subaru: "…"

There were three conditions for Echidna to be released from the tomb.

The first was clearing the Trials to lift the barrier; the second was securing a Magic Crystal to house Echidna's soul; and the third was finalizing their Contract—

Echidna: "To put it simply, my soul was forcibly tethered to the tomb. We needed to reassign your body as my next host to get me out of there."

Subaru: "That was one damn painful ordeal… by the way, don't you think there are too many hidden costs in this Contract of yours?"

Echidna: "Think of it as renting an apartment where they do not disclose that the previous tenant committed suicide… no, that sounds too cheap. Let us say a condo instead. Yes, that fits better."

Subaru: "I think you're missing the point of what's cheap here…"

Echidna's strange obsessions aside, Clind's curiosity was suspicious.

Subaru had told him that he had been out on an errand. That should have been the end of it. Especially for someone in his position, known as the versatile steward, pushing further would have been overstepping.

And yet, the reason he chose to press the issue anyway was—

Subaru: "Clind-san, cut it out with the phony questions."

Clind: "…"

Subaru: "You already know the answer. That's why you came to talk to me. Right?"

Subaru had already figured out Clind's intentions, and met his gaze head-on with a wary glare. In response, Clind slightly widened his eyes, straightened his posture, and said, "With all due respect,"

Clind: "Subaru-sama, you are carrying something rather nasty. Danger."

Subaru: "Danger, huh? You mean this thing hanging around my neck?"

Clind: "The answer to that is both affirmative and negative. That is not what I was referring to. Misjudgment."

Clind gestured toward the Magic Crystal dangled on Subaru's chest with a lowered voice. There was no longer any doubt. —Clind knew precisely what it was.

Clind: "I must advise you that this thing is far worse than dangerous. If you keep it at your side, it will bring harm not only to you, but to everyone around you. Unprecedented."

Subaru: "He's talking about you."

Echidna: "Yes, I can hear that."

Clind's earnest warning might have rattled Subaru in the past. However, the Subaru standing here now was no longer the Subaru he once was.

One could argue that Clind's mistake was underestimating Subaru.

Unfortunately, they had long passed the point where mere conversation could resolve anything between them.

Echidna: "He is the reason you have died more than five hundred times already, after all."

Subaru: "I've already taken every possible precaution at that level."

Clind: "—? What exactly…"

"are you saying?" was probably what Clind was about to say. But, before he could, Subaru, keeping his voice low enough not to draw attention, called out to him with “Clind-san,”

Subaru: “Why are you talking to me? You’ve already made up your mind, haven’t you? You’ll settle this when I’m called up to the stage during the ceremony, out in front of everyone.”

Clind: “—Hk, how.”

Subaru: “Well, It’s strange, really. You’re set on killing me, but you want to avoid causing too much trouble for Emilia and the others. So, you’re aiming for a time and place where suspicion might fall outside of our camp, right?. I’m not sure I follow your reasoning.”

Through countless trials and discussions with Echidna after Subaru’s many deaths, they had concluded that Clind’s intentions were exactly as expected.

In other words, Clind wanted to kill Subaru, the Witch’s contractor, but he also intended to use Subaru’s death as a benefit of Emilia Camp.

Therefore—

Subaru: “I can’t figure out where your loyalty lies. So, be honest with me. —Are you a Witch Cultist? One of the Archbishops of Sin?”

Subaru’s questions for Clind came like an ultimatum.

But it was still too indirect. He knew he needed to be more direct, to cut to the heart of the matter—

Subaru: “Do you know Gluttony? I’ve got something I need to attend to with him.”

Clind: “—To all of your questions, no I shall answer. Denial.”

Subaru: “I see… I see.”

Clind shook his head in response, which was not the answer Subaru had hoped for.

But, as a result, it settled how he would deal with Clind.

Subaru: “Listen up, Clind-san. Where was Annerose again?”

Clind: “…”

Subaru: “That was what you wanted to ask me about right?”

Finding that his master was absent from his side, Clind had approached Subaru alone.

He must have thought that since Annerose was not near the key figures at this ceremony, Subaru would be the only one up to something shady.

It was an insulting assumption. However—

Subaru: “You’re right on the money.”

Clind: “Annerose-sama, where is she? Location.”

Subaru: “She’s now my hostage. I knew you’d try something on that stage, you see. How I found out is a trade secret.”

Clind: “…So, that too is the work of the Witch that accompanies you. Strategy.”

As Clind furrowed his brow in disbelief, Echidna muttered, “How rude,” in Subaru’s mind. But, this misunderstanding worked in his favor.

After all, Natsuki Subaru always found it easier to act when he was underestimated.

Echidna: “Being seen as formidable does have its perks in avoiding getting targeted, you know.”

Subaru: “It’s fine. If I look weaker than Emilia, then I will be targeted first.”

While conversing with Echidna in his head, Subaru kept his eyes on the increasingly wary Clind.

Everyone praised him as a calm, versatile steward. However, even the most composed individual would hesitate to act when their most precious person was in danger.

In that light, bringing Annerose here seemed like a mistake, but it would have been cruel of Subaru to blame Clind for that.

Subaru: “After all, you only decided to kill me after we arrived here.”

Clind: “—. How, to that extent could you…? Incomprehensible.”

Subaru: “I heard it from you directly.”

Clind was aghast. The clear divide between him and Subaru was the difference in knowledge.

Having all his thoughts, actions, and even what he held dear laid bare truly must have felt like a nightmare for Clind.

But, the feeling concerning nightmares was mutual. Subaru had been through his own personal hell more times than he could count.

Echidna: “Want me to tell you how many?”

Subaru: “I’ll pass.”

Rejecting his companion’s offer, who likely had been dutifully keeping track, Subaru focused his attention back on Clind.

Behind those piercing eyes of his, Clind was grappling with inner turmoil. Whatever that conflict was, unfortunately, it lay entirely within Subaru’s grasp.

Clind struggled between securing Annerose’s safety, and pursuing his own objective.

And, Subaru already knew which way the scales would tip.

Subaru: “So, what will it be? Will you surrender?”

Clind: “—No. Preserving the world takes priority. Disloyalty.”

Clind’s gaze sharpened as he said this, his focus shifting toward Subaru’s chest.

Subaru sensed the impending danger. He knew Clind’s Authority of unknown origins would, just like before, try to destroy his heart and inflict a fatal, unrecoverable wound.

Which was why Subaru dealt with it before it could reach him.

Subaru: “—THE WITCH CULT!!”

Clind: “—?!”

Clind’s eyes widened as Subaru’s voice, filled with sharp tension, resounded through the hall.

Right after that moment, just as Clind gasped in surprise.

—A group of fierce warriors, radiating an overwhelming swordsmanship, attacked Clind all at once.

9

Preparing in advance had not been a difficult task for Subaru.

As had been repeatedly stated, Subaru was one of the main guests of honor at this evening’s commendation ceremony. Furthermore, his efforts in taking down the White Whale and Sloth had more than earned him the merit.

The idea that the Witch Cult had sent an assassin to the commendation ceremony to target Subaru was all too convincing to those who had recently clashed with the Cult.

Of course, there was some resistance to the suggestion that the assassin was none other than Clind, the long-serving steward of the Mathers family.

The one most strongly opposed to this was Frederica, who had been trained in the basics of service by Clind himself, and Ram also seemed to share her sentiments to some extent.

Therefore, Subaru had proposed one condition to convince them and those around him.

The condition was—

Echidna: "—That Clind shows murderous intent toward you."

Subaru: "Well, things might get dicey before anyone can make a move if I provoke him too much."

If things went wrong, he could always just start over.

In actuality, even with Annerose as a hostage, Clind's inner conflict still pushed him to choose duty over the safety of his master.

However, the full significance of that duty remained a mystery.

Subaru: "Trying to dig out the true motives of the type of man who doesn't care for parting words is no easy task."

If every enemy were to spill their plans to their dying foe, not many in this world would be compatible with this as much as Subaru. It would make planning for their next encounter much simpler.

But, in reality, most people met their end without hearing much from their killer.

Perhaps they rambled on to their corpses after death, but it would no longer be Subaru's concern by that point.

In any case, Subaru had fulfilled all the necessary conditions to corner Clind.

Clind's fatal mistake was falling for Subaru's provocations and making his move on the spot. If he had taken a better look at his surroundings, he might have noticed that he was being watched.

Echidna: "But you secured his mistress to throw him off balance and keep him from noticing."

The fabricated information about Clind being a Witch Cultist, the efforts to ensure he would not realize he was under suspicion, and a hostage to force his hand.

Subaru had gone through all this just to bring things to this anticipated conclusion.

If any of these conditions had not been met, Subaru would have fallen prey to Clind's Authority for months and years on end—counting all the attempts required to identify him as the enemy, Subaru's retries easily reached four figures.

But, all that time and effort had paid off.

Subaru: "You tried to kill me right in front of everyone. There's no explaining your way out of that."

Indeed, security around the ceremony had intensified, and the evacuation of key figures was swiftly underway.

Seeing the situation turning against him, Clind had leaped from the balcony. However, in light of his previous actions, it was hard to believe he intended to simply flee.

Left unchecked, who knew what Clind might attempt next? Subaru was not the only one who thought so.

And if Clind was thinking the same, then the only logical conclusion was that tonight, here and now, would be the final showdown.

Subaru: "—Hey hey, where are you, bro! Playing hide and seek? How cold!"

Leaning over the balcony railing, Subaru called out provocatively into the garden below.

If he could not pinpoint Clind's location, he would just make himself a grand, obvious target. Anyone in Clind's position would feel compelled to take a shot at Subaru, seeing him standing there wide open and defenseless.

Echidna: "And if that ends up getting you killed?"

Subaru: "So long as I can figure out the trick behind Clind's Authority, I'll call it a win even if he crushes my heart!"

So far, the only thing Subaru knew was that Clind had managed to crush his heart from a distance.

It was an instant-death attack, but it could not be something he could use without any limits.

The number of uses, continuity, and activation conditions. Every time Subaru learned one more detail, he inched closer to putting Clind in checkmate.

Subaru: "Wilhelm-san, Julius, and even the captain of the Royal Guard are with me. I'm sorry it's so one-sided, but I'm gonna crush you with everything I have at my disposal."

Echidna: "You sure are talking a lot… Is this one of your Days of Joy?"

Subaru: "Is that so? I wasn't aware of that though."

Responding to the voice of Echidna in his head, Subaru bared his teeth as he searched for his elusive enemy.

As Echidna had called it, a Day of Joy was one of Subaru's mental states, alongside his Days of Wrath and Calm. It seemed to describe the emotional ups and downs he experienced.

Compared to the other two, Subaru did not show any particularly subjective symptoms. Unlike becoming violently aggressive or sinking into despair, it did not seem like a problem.

Therefore—

Subaru: "I've given you company till now. Stop running around like a mouse, and come at me from the front!"

He deliberately raised his voice, broadcasting his position, and acted provocatively, hoping to flush out his opponent.

Everything was part of the plan. There were no issues there.

Perhaps he was not exactly calm, but one could say he was in the zone. Riding this momentum would lead to a good outcome. Even though he could die as many times as needed, in this situation, he felt like he had died a little too much. Getting reckless with his lives was not the best idea.

Therefore, he judged that taking appropriate actions to secure victory was essential.

???: "—OHHH!"

Suddenly, a loud noise sounded from behind the venue.

It was likely that Clind had clashed with one of his pursuers. Subaru hurried toward the commotion, eager to join the fray.

It was not just his curiosity, influenced by Echidna's penchant for spectacle. No, it was crucial for Subaru to witness the facts with his own eyes.

—Otherwise, he would not fully grasp Clind's actions for the next round.

Subaru: "Tsk."

Rounding the back of the building, Subaru clicked his tongue at the sight that greeted him.

The neatly trimmed hedges and vibrant backyard flower beds were now marred by the bodies of those who had fought valiantly against Clind. They lay crumpled, utterly defeated.

Among them were familiar faces, and Subaru scratched his head at the realization.

Subaru: "I thought I knew this already, but the troublesomeness of Authority holders really is too much to handle."

Clind: "…Is that all you have to say? Heartless."

Subaru: "Heartless? That's rich coming from the guy responsible for all this mess."

Without exception, every fallen figure had their life force entirely extinguished.

Whether it was out of courtesy or caution, Clind had shown no mercy. Either way, the scene was so gruesome that one would want to cover their eyes.

It would have been enough to leave him broken beyond repair had this situation not been reversible.

Subaru: “But, you’re not unscathed either. So, who gave you the most trouble? You’d be doing me a favor by letting me know for future reference.”

Clind: “—! Your acquaintances got rolled up into this and died, and yet this is all you care about? There is too much that is crooked about your way of being. Hideous.”

Clind’s lips curled as he spoke, his voice filled with emotion, his body covered in countless wounds.

He had faced numerous skilled opponents, some of whom even Subaru had relied on as top-tier fighters. Naturally, Clind had not escaped unscathed.

His tattered coat lay discarded, his shirt soaked in blood from a gash across his chest. His monocle lay shattered on the grass, exposing his sharp features as he glared at the defenseless Subaru.

His eyes were filled with fierce hatred and righteous indignation, as if cursing Subaru for being inhuman.

Subaru: “It seems like our opinions don’t match. Guess this is the first time I understand how Echidna feels.”

Echidna: “Maybe now you will treat me a little better.”

Subaru: “I’ll think about it.”

Clind: “Natsuki Subaru-sama, it looks like we’re both already not compatible with each other… Resolve.”

Ignoring his side exchange with Echidna, Clind's eyes were locked on Subaru, full of unwavering hostility.

That hostility was about to take shape and strike Subaru down—right before something intervened.

Frederica: "CLIIIIIIIIND—!!"

A gust of wind tore between Subaru and Clind, accompanied by the flash of long golden hair and the imposing figure of a tall woman clad in a maid's uniform.

Her emerald eyes welled with tears, and her sharp fangs were bared in fury. It was Frederica.

At the sight of her, Clind's expression stiffened ever so slightly.

Clind: "Frederica…"

Frederica: "I always looked down on you, Clind. But regardless of what, I never expected you to get yourself involved with something so tyrannical…"

Grinding her teeth, Frederica surveyed the carnage around her, voicing her bitter frustration.

The blood-soaked garden Clind had created was littered with far more than just ten or twenty lost lives, and it utterly shattered the trust Frederica had held in him, trust that had held strong till the very end, into tiny pieces.

She knew the option of clearing up doubts through discussion was off the table, for it had been Clind who had first shown intent to kill Subaru.

Thus, Frederica glared at Clind with rage and sorrow in her eyes.

Frederica: "Why did you stray from the right path, Clind?"

Clind: "….No matter how much you say, nothing will change. Pointless."

Frederica: "—! Whether it is meaningless or not is not for you to decide, it's up to us!"

Clind: "—. I'm sorry. Apologies."

As Frederica let out a fierce roar, Clind lowered his gaze and uttered those words.

In that moment, Subaru, though an outsider, could almost hear the sound of Frederica's heart cracking.

Frederica: "…"

Frederica's pupils narrowed, and a low growl rumbled from her throat.

In the blink of an eye, her body began to transform, white skin covered by golden fur as her bones audibly shifted. Frederica's form grew in size at an incredible speed.

The next moment, a female golden leopard stood in her place.

The maid's uniform was shredded apart as she transformed, clinging like tattered remnants to her hulking frame as the beast-like Frederica crouched low.

And then—

Clind: "No matter how many years have passed, you never change. Childlike innocence."

Frederica: "How dare you… blown away!!"

With a swift leap, Frederica's body became a whirlwind, the bloodstained petals around her dancing in the violent gust.

As she charged forward at terrifying speed, she caught Clind off guard, sending his body flying into the air. Blood spurted from his left shoulder as he spun, and before he could regain his balance, more savage strikes rained down upon him from all sides.

Echidna: "Tremendous."

As Echidna's brief remark suggested, Frederica's speed was nothing short of extraordinary.

Her movements had always been impressive in her beast form, but the anger she channeled through her limbs after being betrayed had propelled her speed to an entirely new level.

Her claws and fangs tore into Clind's flesh, slowly but surely sapping his remaining strength.

Yet, the fact that Frederica's power could surpass that of the Knights, who had already fallen in the garden, was unlikely. Her fangs only found their mark because those who had fought before her had already weakened Clind's reserves and, perhaps, because of the emotional strain Clind was under.

Even someone as composed as Clind would struggle when faced with turning an old acquaintance into an enemy.

Subaru: "Maybe they're more than just old acquaintances."

Echidna: "—? What do you mean by that?"

Subaru: "It'd be hard to explain the intricacies of male-female relationships to you, so I'll pass."

Although they both saw the same thing, Subaru ignored the Witch and her inability to grasp the situation.

The battle between Frederica and Clind was reaching its climax before his eyes.

Clind: "…"

Still suspended in midair, Clind was helpless as he took the full brunt of Frederica's attacks.

The wounds he sustained and the amount of blood he was losing were accelerating, pushing him ever closer to death from blood loss. However, even with death looming, Clind's eyes remained undaunted.

Amidst the relentless onslaught, his gaze was firmly locked on Subaru.

As if Frederica was nothing more than an afterthought to him.

Frederica: “Where on earth are you looking at—!”

That realization seemed to dawn on Frederica as well.

Her voice trembled with frustration at being ignored, and to Subaru, it almost sounded like she was on the verge of tears.

It was the anguished cry of a young girl, desperately pleading with an adult for attention, unable to comprehend why he would not take her seriously. Her pained voice struck Subaru deeply, but the cold-hearted man remained unaffected.

Without shifting his gaze from Subaru, Clind reached out his hands and said,

Clind: “This too, is for the world… no, for the promise I made. Impoliteness.”

With a voice tinged with regret, Clind’s hands clenched.

In the next instant, Frederica, who had been charging across the ground, lost her balance and was violently thrown to the ground.

Frederica: “—hk?!”

Frederica, covered in dust, had no idea what had just happened.

All she knew was that her limbs had been crushed, and she had lost the ability to run across the ground. And—

Frederica: “S-Subaru-sama…! Please, you must flee!”

The path to Subaru was wide open, with nothing and no one standing in the way.

Frederica: “…”

Writhing on the ground, Frederica’s body slowly began reverting from beast to human. But, of course, the wounds she had sustained did not conveniently heal in the process.

With her limbs crushed and her body covered in grievous injuries, Frederica lay there helpless. And yet, despite being horribly wounded himself, Clind walked past her with steady steps.

Clind's body was as battered and bloodied as Frederica's, but his eyes showed no sign of weakness. Only an unwavering, ironclad resolve.

Subaru: "So you can make that kind of face too. How unexpected, Clind-san."

Clind: "…The words I have exchanged with you are far too brief. Scant."

Subaru: "Yeah, you're right. I wanted to talk more to you… It's sorta got a deceptive tone about it, but that's what I really think. Perhaps we could have built a different relationship."

In another timeline, in a what-if scenario, perhaps there could have been a different path.

But even if that path had existed, becoming closer to someone destined to betray him would only have hurt Subaru more.

Subaru: "That's why I am glad I didn't become friends with you. This is the right path"

Clind: "—. You really are acting complacent. No one can defend you anymore. Defenseless."

Clind frowned in suspicion as Subaru casually stood there with his hands in his pockets.

Subaru understood why he was confused, and part of him felt slightly guilty. But, after enduring countless Deaths, this was only natural.

Subaru: "Sorry, but you won't shake me so easily anymore."

Clind: “—?”

Subaru: “I’m not feigning confidence. If you wanted to, Clind-san, you could kill me in an instant. And that’s not a big deal.”

If he were to die, he would just come back with a new plan.

Echidna and Roswaal understood why Subaru’s Authority was the most terrifying, yet the most remarkable. Even Subaru knew this was essentially cheating.

He was using his cheat ability to the fullest, as one would expect of someone who had been summoned to another world.

Clind: “Your thinking is hard to comprehend. Unfathomable. But, prepare yourself for—”

Subaru: “Oh, just one more thing.”

Clind had given up on trying to understand Subaru’s strange confidence.

But, before his hands could reach Subaru’s chest, Subaru interrupted him, raising a single finger as he pulled his hand from his pocket,

Subaru: “—I made sure Frederica would be next if I died.”

Clind: “…”

Subaru didn’t miss the slight twitch that froze Clind’s expression.

That reaction alone was more than enough of a gain.

Clind’s weak point was neither his Contract with Roswaal, nor was it Annerose.

Clind: “The real threat was never the Witch. It was you. Wicked.”

Subaru heard Clind mutter in a trembling voice, horrified to the core by the realization.

Calling him wicked might have been a bit much, Subaru thought, feeling dissatisfied as the moment his heart would burst was approaching—

10

???: “It was an unknown situation, but you handled it rather well. How are you feeling?”

Subaru: “Nothing to worry about. I’m feeling great.”

On the familiar hill, Subaru responded to Echidna’s straightforward question.

Subaru was dressed in the black formal attire he had worn for the commendation ceremony. It might be a bit late to mention this, but the dress code for the Witch’s tea party was whatever the guest happened to be wearing when they were summoned.

As a result, he had been stuck in his tracksuit during the tea parties in the Sanctuary, and this time, he was stuck in his formal attire.

Subaru: “Let’s just hope I don’t get accidentally summoned while I’m in the bathroom.”

Echidna: “Ah, that’s a way to do it.”

Subaru: “That wasn’t a suggestion. You’re more of a peeping Witch than a curious bystander.”

Echidna snapped her fingers with a serious look on her face, and Subaru, leaning in, flicked her on the forehead. “Ow!” the Witch exclaimed, recoiling with a grimace.

Echidna rubbed her reddened forehead and said,

Echidna: “How rude of you. Not like by now there isn’t a place on your body that I haven’t seen.”

Subaru: “Yeah, that’s because I bring that Magic Crystal everywhere, even in the toilet and the bath! But, it’s about my feelings, okay? Modesty is important. Absolutely.”

Echidna: “You have the values of a maiden…”

Echidna muttered in exasperation, lowering her hand from her forehead, where the redness had already faded from her alabaster skin. Subaru could not help but be impressed by the Witch’s flair for theatrics.

In any case, as Echidna had pointed out, the unknown situation had been handled.

Subaru: “Identifying the enemy, assessing the situation, establishing countermeasures, and finding the best solution…”

Echidna: “That fight revealed much about the tasks we face going forward. We might have lost some things, but I would say we gained just as much.”

Subaru: “I can’t argue with that… Though the follow-up with Annerose and Frederica won’t be easy.”

Subaru rubbed his chin, imagining the grief-stricken faces of the two women, and bit his lip.

In the end, they had resolved to frame the situation under the assumption that Clind had been a Witch Cultist.

Clind had shown clear intent to harm Subaru and retaliated without ever attempting to explain himself. With both of these facts in place, not a single person could defend him.

Strictly speaking, Subaru could have defended him, but that was a futile thought.

—Clind’s response to Subaru’s question had become the pivotal moment that sealed his fate.

Echidna: “Irony, isn’t it?. Had he truly been a Witch Cultist, you might have kept him alive to extract information about Gluttony. But…”

Subaru: “But Clind wasn’t a Witch Cultist. Which just made him a dangerous threat.”

And, Subaru was not confident enough to believe he could keep a dangerous man like him alive. At the very least, some kind of safeguard would have been necessary, and Clind had none.

Thus, Annerose and Frederica had been left in tears.

Echidna: “Beyond that, the damage was minimized. You could call it a result worth celebrating.”

Subaru: “…Yeah. It’d better be.”

If it were not, then there was no point in making them cry.

He had saved lives. He had prevented further damage. Moreover, he knew it would have been ideal to protect their hearts as well. He knew, but how could he possibly—

Echidna: “Natsuki Subaru, you must not misunderstand.”

Subaru: “Echidna?”

Echidna: “Your Authority allows you to choose the best result through infinite retries. But, the best result does not necessarily mean saving everyone involved.”

Subaru: “…”

Subaru fell silent as Echidna’s harsh words sank into his heart.

Even if he chose the best option, it was impossible to prevent everyone he cared for from receiving even the slightest scratch. But, if he accepted that, it felt like Subaru’s entire purpose would crumble.

It did not matter if he had to die a hundred, a thousand, or ten thousand times, so long as he could save everyone else.

That was the only reason Natsuki Subaru continued to challenge the spiral of Death.

Echidna: “Your feelings are noble, and your desire for your loved ones to be at peace is pure.”

Before Subaru, as his resolve wavered, Echidna spoke softly, her voice gentle.

In an uncharacteristically motherly manner, she gazed at Subaru and continued,

Echidna: “But, you cannot protect everyone forever, as if they were in a cradle. Even in the best of outcomes, shards of glass will slip through. And, those shards may cause wounds.”

Subaru: “…Then, how do I remove that glass?”

Echidna: “On that matter, my answer is as follows: You cannot remove all of the shards. There will be wounds. However…”

Subaru was about to protest her statement, but Echidna quickly continued, repeating the word “however” in a soft murmur,

Echidna: “So long as you stay alive, your wounds will heal. The Frederica and Annerose who you made cry today, tomorrow…or the day after, will stop crying.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “Scratches will scab over, and eventually heal. If you worry so much about never even inflicting such wounds, your feet will stop moving, and you will be unable to move forward.”

Echidna’s carefully chosen words pierced Subaru’s heart without mercy.

Indeed, Echidna was right. Subaru had started to lose sight of what “best” even meant. He kept second-guessing himself, even after things had ended.

He had eliminated Clind. And as a result, Annerose and Frederica had been left in tears.

If he did not want to make them cry, should he have let Clind live? But, how else could Subaru have dealt with a man who wanted him dead?

That was—

Echidna: "—You are not wrong."

Subaru: "Ah…"

Echidna: "I will continue to guarantee your righteousness. You have saved lives, found a way to the future, and left hope in your wake, thus paving the way for new possibilities. That is the result of your actions."

Whenever Subaru's resolve wavered, whenever he felt lost, the Witch was there to bring him back to reason.

Just as she had done countless times before, Echidna stood before Subaru and pulled him back from the brink.

He had used Return by Death hundreds of times now, and as a result, his fear of Death had dulled, and the crushing sense of loss and helplessness had faded. But still, some part of him was wearing thin.

His fraying and fragile soul was pulled back once again, and Subaru held his ground.

A swirl of wrath, calm, fleeting joy; this was what had overwhelmed his heart.

Subaru: "Even if I save them, wounds will remain. But…"

Echidna: "Where there is life…"

Subaru: "Where there is life… there is a future. Where there is a future, there is hope. Where there is hope, there is possibility. Where there is possibility—"

Echidna: "—People can be saved."

Echidna quietly finished Subaru's half-mumbled sentence.

People could be saved. The wounds they suffer would eventually heal.

The two who cried today would dry their tears tomorrow, lift their heads the day after, and the next day, perhaps even start walking forward again. Or, at least, begin to prepare to do so.

For that purpose—

Subaru: “—Let’s move time forward. I… no, we have a lot to do.”

Echidna: “—. Very well. So, where shall we begin next?”

Echidna deliberately did not comment on Subaru’s use of “we.”

And that was fine. He was not looking for her to cling to him.

He just wanted to confirm it: the unbreakable bond of complicity between her and him.

Subaru: “Ah, about that—”

And so, the journey of trial and error would continue, with the Witch bound to him in this shared complicity.

Prologue IV: The Progeny of the Lion King

???: “—Leave the Kingdom together with Old Man Rom. If you do that, your safety will be guaranteed.”

In the middle of the night, she woke up to a presence entering her bedroom and shuddered.

The first thing that pierced through her mind was disappointment in her own loosened vigilance.

In the slums where she had originally lived, everyone around her was an enemy. There was no time or place where she could let her guard down. That was why she never lowered her defenses, even in her bedroom.

That should have been her source of pride for having grown up in the slums for fifteen years—

???: “I’m sorry for all the complications and self-reflection that’s being posed on you, but you’re not losing sleep over it, are you?”

Felt: “…Hey you, I don’t know who the fuck you are or where you’re from, but do you even know who you’re picking a fight with?”

With a low-voiced threat, she argued back while still lying down on the bed.

Being treated with contempt was naturally the shameful sight it was, but she wasn’t going to tolerate it indefinitely. So,

Even if this rubbed the other person the wrong way, she absolutely refused to grovel.

???: “You sure are acting tough, huh? Let me just tell you right now, that damn Reinhard is…”

Felt: “Screw you. Why did Reinhard’s name come up when I’m the one that messed up, and now I gotta wipe my own ass?”

???: “…”

Felt: “I’m telling you, don’t think you can get away with this for free. If you show me an opening, in an instant I’ll… oh?”

She had intended with determination to bite his unguarded windpipe. However, her intent was dampened by the intruder’s strange reaction.

Standing beside the bed, the intruder looked at her—suddenly, for some reason, his shoulders shook, and he began to chuckle a small laugh.

Felt: “Wh-What the hell’s so funny?”

???: “Hey, don’t use such a loud voice. I’m not sure if you can see what’s going on here… Well, you’re just being yourself by not calling Reinhard at this point, aren’t you?”

Felt: “Huh?”

She turned her head with a frown to the intruder, whose voice sounded somewhat distracted.

The initial sharp intensity was gone, as was the feeling of him doing something untoward if she moved. You could call it carelessness and it would be so, or you could call it intuition and it would be so.

In any case, it did not result in her regretting having turned around.

The intruder had done nothing to her, and more importantly, the person standing there was a familiar face.

Felt: “…Bro, what the hell are you doing here?”

???: “For no reason at all. My demands… wait, were you still half asleep and you didn’t hear me?”

Felt: “No, I heard you saying something about taking Old Man Rom and leaving…”

The demand did not match her impression of the person in front of her—a familiar, black-haired boy.

Looking at the boy, she saw he was unarmed, despite coming to threaten her.

He did not appear to be carrying a weapon, nor was he prepared to restrain her. As she slowly lifted herself off the bed, he did not tell her to wait or stop.

Naturally, she felt foolish for being so cautious, and roughly scratched her golden hair.

Regardless of the situation, there was no mistaking the fact that she had been caught off guard—

Felt: “Like, how did you even manage to sneak in? That damn Reinhard isn’t home tonight, but there’s other scary people here in this mansion…”

Black-haired Boy: “Yeah, there are. Flam and Grassis, yeah? The bodyguard twins, they might look cute, but they’re really good at what they do, so they gave me a hard time.”

Felt: “…”

Black-haired Boy: “And by a strange coincidence, I also know the three thugs you’re taking care of here at your place. I guess this is what they mean when they say that it’s a small world.”

When he had calmly pointed out those who should have been in the mansion, she fell silent.

Upon hearing that, she could feel a cold sweat breaking out on her back; and, gritting her teeth, she realized that her vigilance had been loosened in earnest.

The boy before her, his demeanor was certainly almost the same as the one she knew.

However, that in itself was unusual.

He had broken into a mansion that was difficult to infiltrate, even late at night, and moreover, he had managed to breach her guard and was now standing beside her bed, all the while remaining unchanged from before.

Felt: "—. What happened to the others? If you messed with them…"

Black-haired Boy: "No mercy? Don't worry. I'm not a kid who would retaliate just because I've been beaten up. And if you were to make a fuss, Reinhard would immediately come running."

Felt: "…And if I were to raise my voice, the same thing you did to them would happen to me, wouldn't it?"

Black-haired Boy: "Yeah, you're not wrong about that. So please don't. If you don't, then…"

Felt: "If I don't?"

Black-haired Boy: "—I'll keep your family's secret private."

He bent down slightly and whispered in her ear.

This was not a bluff or a random remark: she knew this by intuition, without the need for evidence.

And, in this case, "Family" could only refer to one person in her life.

Felt: "What do you know about Old Man Rom?"

Black-haired Boy: "A lot. I know a lot. In fact, it's not just about Old Man Rom, but I know far more about you than you do yourself… Though, I kinda feel like a stalker saying it like that."

Standing in front of her, the boy shrugged slightly and touched his neck—rather, the crystal hanging from it, with a wry smile as if he were sharing a joke with a friend.

The bizarre atmosphere made it impossible for her to deny him in this instance.

Black-haired Boy: “If you want to know all the details, I can tell you, but your family is quite the enemy of the Kingdom. If they were to find out his identity, they’d one hundred percent have him arrested and executed. It’s at the level that you, and all the members of your Camp, would all be implicated. I really don’t want to be doing that, either.”

Felt: “What the hell are you even talking about…?”

Black-haired Boy: “I’m going to suggest it from my own mouth. …I may have come across as a little bit of a douche.”

The boy scratched his cheek and showed no significant reaction to her swearing. It was as if he was already fully prepared, and all he had to do was to make her nod her head.

Felt: “…”

Perhaps, the boy was not in a situation that granted him as much leeway as it appeared.

In fact, if Reinhard were to be called, whatever the situation was, it would be turned upside down in an instant. However, it did not seem like he was anticipating that to happen.

If Reinhard were to be called, surely information would be circulated that would put her family in danger.

Black-haired Boy: “If you can understand that much without me having to explain everything, then you must be a good candidate for King.”

Felt: “—Geez, that just sounds like sarcasm to me.”

Whether he was aware of it or not, his words seemed like a natural provocation.

Then there was a long, long silence—

Felt: “—I understand. I’ll do as you say.”

Black-haired Boy: “Is that so. That’s good. Well then, I’ve prepared various escape routes for you.”

As she nodded, he suddenly looked relieved, and the boy pulled a bag from under the bed. When she looked at its contents, everything was meticulously provided, and the preparations were thorough.

It was really eerie how everything had been studied and planned to such an extent, sending shivers down her spine.

Black-haired Boy: “Go straight to Old Man Rom’s room. I’ve already talked to him too.”

She had no interest in learning how he had accomplished it, and she did not bother to inquire.

Accepting the offered bag, she glided past the boy while still in her sleepwear, enjoying the feeling of being in control of everything. Just before leaving the room, she halted her step—

Felt: “—Not trying to be a sore loser or anything, but that face of yours looks like the devil, bro.”

Having spoken those words, she swiftly exited the room without waiting to witness his reaction.

There seemed to be no possibility of victory. Now that he had become their adversary, not even Reinhard, or…

Feeling such bone-chilling fear, the blonde royal selection candidate withdrew from the Royal Selection.

Chapter IV: Accumulating Life in Another World from Zero with a Witch

1

A dream, I had a dream.

A dream that would not fade, a dream that kept repeating, a dream with no end, a dream that would not end—.

Over and over again, many many times over, repeating mistakes over and over, correcting them more and more.

One thousand times, spinning. Ten thousand times, connecting. One hundred million times, overcoming them.

And before knowing it, losing track of counting.

Agony, terror, turbidity, ruin, hatred, madness.

Exhausted, shaken, twisted, corrupted, contorted, decayed, anguished; a heart smashed to pieces.

And yet, there was still a place I wanted to reach.

And yet, there was still a wish I wanted to protect.

Even if no one knew about the endless tragedies that repeated over and over, I would not forget.

Even if no one notices, only I am unable to forget.

—Even if the people I want to save wept, I still want to save them.

So, even now, I do not regret having taken that hand.

If there is something I regret, it would be that I was hesitant and indecisive in taking her hand, and the frustration towards my own weak, fragile heart that I could not steel.

2

—Waking up from an empty dream, the first thing he always felt was a throbbing headache.

???: "…"

Drowsily waiting for the awakening of consciousness, shrouded in ambiguous mist. It would not take long. The groggy awakening took only a few seconds, and immediately his consciousness detached from that sleep, awakening.

???: "Ah, Aaah."

As his physical body began to wake, he confirmed his body's condition with a drawn-out voice.

At a glance, it appeared like he was still half-asleep, but this was an important part of his morning routine. By lying on his back, he let out his voice and gathered several pieces of information.

The tone of his voice, the establishment of his consciousness, the safety of his limbs, the organization of his memories, the progression of his day, and the existence of his life—.

Even so, it was easy to lose track of the correct flow of time. He could not neglect to verify it.

All of this, was evidence that Natsuki Subaru had reached the morning without making any grave mistakes.

Subaru: "Fuwa…"

Peeling off the blanket while yawning, he slowly lifted his body from the bed.

He roughly scratched his head and looked around the room he had become accustomed to seeing—it was luxuriously furnished, and standing out within the room's interior was a canopy bed.

But, where Subaru had woken up was not the luxurious bed, but rather a sofa placed further within the room. Curled up in a ball, hugging a blanket, was how he had spent the nights recently—no, rather, this had been the nighttime habit of Natsuki Subaru for what he felt was several years now.

Be that as it may, there was not any significant reason for him to not sleep in his bed.

It was simply the result of striving to find a comfortable sleeping environment, even if just a little bit. After various trials and errors, he had found that he felt more of a semblance of peaceful sleep by sleeping on the sofa rather than in the bed.

Perhaps it was the feeling of being on the edge that suited his nature, as if one careless toss and turn would send him to the floor.

Subaru: "…"

Putting those feelings aside, Subaru stood up from the sofa and headed to the washroom so he could get ready. He washed his face in the washroom that was adjacent to the bedroom, and observed his wet face in the mirror.

His face held a look of fatigue, and his eyes gave off a sense of despondency. His face looked frayed with dejection, and his overall demeanor appeared listless in every aspect, both mentally and physically.

In an attempt to tighten his sagging expression, he slapped his own cheeks as hard as he could with both hands.

A dry sound and numbing pain accompanied the tears that welled up; in order to wash them away, he poured cold water onto his face. Once again, he looked at his wet face in the mirror, and whilst carefully kneading his face, eyes, and cheeks, he spoke.

Subaru: "Smile… you gotta smile. If you can't, then… die."

Chanting this incantation, Subaru bent his mouth into a terrible, crooked smile.

He flashed his white teeth, his smile narrowing his eyes so the whites were no longer fully visible; this was the villainous side of himself that he had been acquainted with for around eighteen years. He could “camouflage” his eyes, his facial expression, and his countenance with no issues.

Subaru: “Oookay, okay. Keep it like this.”

Commanding his reflection in the mirror to maintain the smile, Subaru quickly dried his face with a towel and changed his clothes.

While living at the Mansion, Subaru’s appearance was not garbed in a servant’s uniform or a tracksuit, but rather, he predominantly wore the formal attire of a fairly dignified noble. He loosened the collar of his formal jacket, rolled up his sleeves to his elbows, giving a relaxed appearance, but surprisingly, there were no complaints about his manner of dress.

Given his position, and likely due to his achievements as well, he was expected to dress accordingly in public.

Individuals with power and high status were allowed some degree of personal freedom. —Just like how Roswaal, despite his clownish appearance, silenced those around him with his status of Margrave.

Compared to that, Subaru’s disheveled formal attire could be considered charming. Despite feeling a bit stuffy, he was still dressing in a manner befitting his position. After all, this position was something Subaru himself desired.

It would be absurd to refuse himself that which he desired.

Subaru: “Can’t stay here any longer. It’s about time.”

Straight away after he had finished changing, Subaru looked up to the Magic Hour Crystal that had been furnished above the room’s door and muttered.

It had a dark green hue, signifying that it was morning: it showed that his time for getting out of bed was soon. Apparently, it seemed like this morning he had spent just a little bit too much time practicing his smile in front of the mirror.

In a few more minutes, a meticulously punctual girl would visit his room right on schedule.

Before that, he needed to finish everything he had not done yet.

Subaru: "…"

Letting out a long exhale, Subaru opened his shirt's collar with a feeling of gloom.

There, resting against his skin, even during sleep, was the dull shimmer of a black Magic Crystal. Clenching it in his palm, Subaru directed his consciousness towards the mysteriously gleaming crystal.

The sensation of the cold, hard stone, gradually warming within Subaru's palm, even induced an illusion that it started pulsating like a living thing.

At some point, Subaru's own heartbeat even began to synchronize with that of the Magic Crystal in his grasp.

The Magic Crystal continued to beat faster and higher than one's pulse after an all-out sprint. Its pulsation and Subaru's heartbeat perfectly overlapped, equalling each other. —Right after that.

Subaru: "…"

By the time he had realized it, Subaru's consciousness was enveloped in white light, and he felt detached from his physical body.

The separation of his consciousness from his physical body was almost a sign of awakening from sleep. He had tasted the sensation of being pulled up from the depths of slumber twice within such a short span, and his vision began to clear.

A vast, green plain spread out as far as the eyes could see.

The sunlight, almost blinding, poured down, and a sea of grass swayed magnificently in the sweeping wind. A world where the blue of the sky and the green of the earth went on forevermore, up until they hazily intersected in the distant horizon.

It was a dreamlike world, lacking a sense of reality, possessing an unreal beauty which suited it.

Magnificently clear, eternally silent. —Right at the center of it all, there was a small hill that harmonized with the landscape.

Atop the gently sloping hill, a white table and parasol could be seen from afar, and Subaru slowly directed his feet toward them as if he was being led.

Under the parasol, upon the round table, were cups emitting steam; within the ceramic cups, amber-coloured liquid was warmly contained.

Two cups had been set upon the table, and white chairs had been placed on both ends of the table.

Subaru did not even confirm that the chair was prepared for him before sitting down on it. Though the tea had just recently finished brewing, he held the cup to his mouth, wetting his throat with its contents.

He had already lost count of how many cups he had already consumed, as the enigmatic tea continued to fill Subaru's insides. This strange tea, tasteless and odorless, however, was an absolute requirement for attending this tea party.

Hand-prepared by the host of the tea party, it was a cup offered as a form of greeting, a mandatory gesture.

And, as Subaru accepted this strange hospitality,

Subaru: "Ah, I drank it, I drank it, thanks for the drink. Alright, let's quickly move onto the main subject."

???: "—Of course, I suppose I did say that the first sip worked as a greeting. However, I do not believe that means that you should never give me a simple hello, mhm?"

After emptying his cup, Subaru tossed it aside as he spoke. Upon the cup breaking on top of the hill and his rude response, the person sitting across the table from him voiced their dissatisfaction.

In response to this complaint, Subaru showed no signs of remorse, and,

Subaru: “There’s no real reason to greet you. After all, since you’re peering inside and outside of my head day and night, does saying hello or goodbye to you have any meaning?”

Girl: “This and that are different matters, you know? First of all, saying that I watch you day and night: I would like for you not to speak of it in such a scandalous manner. Even supposing it is true, I am still a young maiden, as delicate as a flower. Would my reputation not become all the more worse if it became known that I am always staring into a boy’s mind?”

Subaru: “A young maiden, as delicate as a flower; did the meaning of those words change without my knowledge?”

Girl: “How scathing of you. Well, maybe it is unreasonable at my age to insist on calling myself a maiden.”

Saying so, the girl relaxed her mouth into a smile, quite contrasting the contents of her complaints.

She did not seem to express a particularly strong sense of wariness or fear to begin with; in fact, the girl was quite tolerant of Subaru’s casual, impolite language. Even this exchange seemed to be a source of amusement for her.

Subaru could not help but feel an intensifying sense of guilt within his heart upon seeing that smile. He knew the true nature of this guilt. —However, it was ugly enough to make him want to avert his gaze from it.

Thus, Subaru stared back at the girl who evoked such emotions, and averted his gaze from his own guilt.

Subaru: “As expected, you’re such an unpleasant woman.”

Girl: “How glad it makes me to hear that. Rather than becoming someone desirable to you in all manner of ways, rather than becoming someone apathetic for whom you cannot see the value in assisting with your helping hand, for your kind, greedy self, becoming someone hateful who cruelly wounds your heart and drives in a wedge that cannot be removed, would please me more than anything."

Even in the face of sarcasm without preamble, her response remained composed.

She was aware that her reply might have provoked a displeased expression from Subaru, or even have made him feel bitter, but she continued in that manner, leading him on.

Girl: "Now then, any more of this, and my heart will become pained from buying into your antipathy and being so loathed. Let us try to achieve the purpose for this morning's rendezvous, shall we?"

Subaru: "You weren't hoping to be hated?"

Girl: "It was the bluff of a cute girl, you know? This is what I want you to see and accept."

Subaru: "Cute…?"

Subaru tilted his head in sincere doubt deep in his heart; his companion merely gave an ironic smile.

And then—

Girl: "Truly, you are a man fearless to a fault. As the Witch of Greed, I like that about you. —Natsuki Subaru."

This contractor was worthy of being called the Witch of Greed.

Echidna narrowed her eyes with a sweet smile, a smile of genuine joy.

3

Subaru: "Today's the fourteenth of Kisdam… right?"

Echidna: "Yes, you are correct. Fortunately, nothing abnormal happened to you last night. You slept on that cramped sofa and endured the night's discomfort, waking up without any issues… But still, you are quite cautious, are you not? No need to worry so much, you know?”

Subaru: “Such stupid words. Living without caution, and waking up dead in the morning, is also a possibility. Us humans, we never know when or where we’re gonna die.”

Clicking his tongue at the Witch’s optimism, Subaru recalled the desperate feeling of loss his Deaths left him.

Without warning, the tomorrow he trusted would come would suddenly be taken from him by a Return by Death to the past—time forgotten by the people with whom he spent his time; how much fear and disappointment had he tasted upon realizing he would need to rebuild those relationships?

Subaru: “The world could end at any moment, and it wouldn’t surprise me anymore. That’s…”

Echidna: “—I agree. I was thoughtless just now. My apologies for that.”

Subaru: “…What, aren’t you being terribly meek right now?”

Echidna: “I apologise if you thought of it as a bad thing. I believe it is about time you acknowledged that I am not that bad of a woman.”

Resting her cheek against her palm, with her elbow on the table, Echidna sent a seductive sidelong glance toward Subaru.

Her enchanting white hair, long eyelashes, and a beautiful face with a straight nose were like a supreme work of art that was rarely seen, and many painters would break their brushes at such unreproducible beauty.

Sometimes jokingly, she boasted that she had received marriage proposals from royalty in the past; perhaps, this might not have been a lie.

However—

Subaru: “Hmmmm…”

Echidna: “—? What is it? Staring at my face in such a way… is there something on it?”

Subaru: “Aaah, just hair, and ears, and a mouth, and a nose, and eyes…”

Echidna: “…Hm, I wonder why? Even though you say something completely obvious, I feel insulted.”

When she showed such a vexed emotion, the solemn atmosphere of the Witch instantly dissipated.

What remained was the face of a remarkably youthful girl, contrasting with her actual age, despite her exterior matching the age one would expect. She would appear far more attractive to boys his age than a serene beauty, akin to a painting.

Of course, Subaru’s aesthetic sense had already determined the pinnacle of beauty, so discovering Echidna’s new charms would be just like adding another entry to an encyclopedia.

Echidna: “Did I receive a worse impression than I had thought just now?!”

Subaru: “I didn’t even say anything. That’s a false accusation.”

Echidna: “The way you put it, you might have been thinking something quite harsh, even if you did not mutter it aloud. Hiding things from me will not work. We are not that distant.”

Subaru: “I didn’t say anything because I didn’t want to intentionally sour our relationship…”

Echidna: “See! I knew you were thinking something terrible after all!”

Reacting as if she had taken an oni’s head, she made a fuss about Subaru’s inner thoughts.

Subaru knew from experience that either telling the truth or hiding it would only cause a fuss, so he covered his ears and lowered his head, waiting for the storm to pass.

Echidna: “Generally, your attitude as of late is becoming quite unbearable. You have been treating me, the Witch of Greed, with much disdain. I do not expect admiration or awe from you, but there must be a more appropriate way for you to treat me.”

Subaru: “An appropriate way of treating you, like what?”

Echidna: “More like treating a noble with respect, or treating a beautiful woman with hospitality.”

Gently placing her hand on her chest, Echidna threw out a troublesome request at him.

It had become a regular occurance, this time of Echidna seeking attention.

This was not to say that Subaru’s mental state was fluctuating due to experiencing successive Returns by Death, but rather that Echidna was extremely troublesome in this situation.

Also, he did not want to deal with her after having just woken up.

Echidna: “Your casualness is quite refreshing and pleasant for me. But, sometimes, I would not mind having a moment that reminds you of who I am, you know?”

Subaru: “A moment that reminds me of who you are… does that mean making someone puke upon meeting them for the first time?”

Echidna: “When you cut it down to just that, I feel that my nature is greatly misunderstood!”

Saying this and that, Subaru frowned at Echidna’s attention-seeking behavior.

In the past, he had tried to deal with her in a straightforward manner, but the more he did so, the more she took advantage of him, leading him to avoid taking her seriously ever since.

Therefore, Subaru quickly shifted the conversation off topic with an "Anyway".

Subaru: "If you're just gonna idly chatter, I'm out."

Echidna: "Hmm… that is not exactly a heartwarming conversation. In the first place, you do not seem to be in great shape this morning. So, it would not hurt to rest here a bit longer."

Subaru: "…Certainly, there are times when staying here brings relief."

As he rose from his chair while cracking his neck, Echidna's eyes lit up as she responded to Subaru with a "Right?" But there was more to Subaru's words.

Indeed, during this tea party, Subaru's consciousness was isolated from the outside world, allowing him to stay here longer in spirit alone. There had been times when this mental refuge had brought him solace.

Subaru: "In situations like that, I won't hesitate to indulge you. But, not now."

Echidna: "Are you worried of becoming weak if you rely on others? That is a stoic way of thinking, but does it really make sense? After all, I am your only accomplice… I'm someone with whom you can share your pain and sorrow."

Subaru: "—. I'm grateful to you."

In fact, without Echidna's presence, the current Subaru would not exist.

By extension, that also meant that the peace that Subaru's loved ones enjoyed today also would not be possible.

Echidna's affirmation, support, and advice had all helped Subaru to overcome the numerous obstacles that had stood in his way. He had to admit that her presence had been empowering.

However—

Subaru: “However, I don’t intend to entrust my pain and sorrow to anyone. This is mine and mine alone, and I’m going to get over it on my own, which is why you and I made this Contract. Isn’t that right?”

Echidna: “…That is the one aspect you will not bend on. How lonely that makes me.”

With her eyes downcast, framed by long lashes, Echidna muttered with a sense of loneliness. As it was, she brought the cup to her mouth, a sign that she had let go of her intention to continue this conversation.

After witnessing this, Subaru turned his back on her and looked down the hill. Below the gentle slope, in the middle of the green meadow, an unnatural structure—a door, appeared.

This corridor was the only link between this Castle of Dreams and reality.

Subaru: “Earlier, you didn’t deny the idea of peeping on me constantly, did you?”

Echidna: “…I thought I had prefaced that with “hypothetically”?”

Subaru: “With my language skills, that sounds like how a conniving mastermind would speak.”

Echidna: “…”

At this hounding from Subaru, who had turned away earlier, Echidna let out a small sigh. Then she put her mouth on the cup once more. It was a sign that she had let go of her intention to continue this conversation—

Subaru: “From now on, I’m removing the Magic Crystal when I go to the toilet or wash myself.”

Echidna: “Aahh”

Replying with “What’s with that aahh?”, Subaru clicked his tongue and finally left the tea party.

Standing in front of the door at the bottom of the hill, Subaru put his hand on the doorknob and casually turned around.

There, on top of the hill, Echidna's hair fluttered in the wind as she absentmindedly watched Subaru's back. Noticing his gaze, Echidna gave a small wave of her hand.

For a moment, Subaru hesitated whether to wave back or not, and then, with only a sigh, he pushed open the door.

—And, straight after, his consciousness that had been captured by the dream world was released, returning back to reality.

Subaru: "…"

When his consciousness came back to reality, Subaru was still standing in his own room, holding the Magic Crystal.

He let out a long breath and raised his gaze; the color of the Magic Hour Crystal had not yet changed. The time he had spent in the world of dreams was only a few seconds in real time. It could be said to be a Room of Spirit and Time.

Subaru: "Still, I'll never get used to it…"

It had become part of his morning routine to be invited to that world of dreams, and to participate in Echidna's tea party.

By doing so, it helped Subaru grasp the current situation, and it had become a habit to ensure that there was no discrepancy between his perception and what was true; however, he still struggled with the time lag when he returned from the tea party to reality.

Echidna suggested he could stay longer without any worries, but that seemed to come with its own set of problems.

Spending long periods in that spiritual world, only to suddenly realize that his soul had aged by hundreds of years, would be a truly historical mysterious turn of events.

???: "—The aging of your soul, and your links with the Witch, shall one day become poison that will definitely consume you. Please do not forget that. Reflection.”

Subaru: “…”

Suddenly, Subaru’s thoughts suddenly echoed with a man’s last words and testament.

The poor enemy, who was completely seen through by the machinations of a Subaru who accumulated Return by Deaths, had all of his countermeasures prevented, had his escape route completely blocked, had lost his allies, and was left alone and helpless.

In the end, Natsuki Subaru’s battle had become ultimately one-sided.

His foe’s defeat was no exception. His rebellious spirit was completely conquered, and the battle was settled without causing any damage to the surroundings and without any bloodshed other than that of the enemy.

Those words that he heard were the final words of a man spoken in such a situation, with Death looming before him.

Someday, Subaru would regret his own way of being. If such a time were to come, would that man be waiting for Subaru in the depths of hell?

Subaru: “But, it’s unfortunate. After I die, where my soul goes is predestined.”

Even if all of his bitter foes were waiting for Subaru in hell, Subaru’s soul would never arrive there.

They would be waiting there, all alone, forever, continuing to be consumed by Subaru, even after death.

But, he would like them to tolerate that much. Subaru, also, did not expect that the afterlife would be easy.

Subaru: “That’s what they call a Contract with a Witch.”

???: “…Um, did I ever say something about taking your soul?”

As Subaru muttered deeply to himself, a different sort of hallucination echoed in his mind, distinct from the voice of the deceased man.

It sounded very similar to the voice of the Witch with whom he had just parted ways.

Echidna: “No, this is not a hallucination. It really is me.”

Subaru: “I know that. Shut up.”

Subaru silently refuted the voice of the Witch that seemed to be whispering in his ear.

The source of the voice was the Magic Crystal that Subaru had placed around his neck again. He flicked it with his finger in annoyance and snorted at the voice, which he could hear without having to go back to the dream world.

The reason as to why so few words were exchanged as their parting was quite apparent.

Echidna: “It is not necessary for you to linger, as we can always talk anytime.”

Subaru: “Don’t just randomly start talking to me when you don’t have business with me, just because you can.”

Echidna: “It is not uncommon for a Spiritual Arts User and their contracted Spirit to communicate telepathically. And, how should I put it, I do not believe anyone would pay much attention, even if your monologues increased at this point.”

Having had a sore spot poked, Subaru furrowed his brows with displeasure.

As soon as Echidna felt Subaru’s discomfort, she exclaimed “Oops”, and continued,

Echidna: “I will comply with your request here. Please, do not hesitate to call upon me if you need me, contractor-dono."

Leaving behind those theatrical words, communication with the telepathic Echidna ceased.

Although the physical distance between them had not changed, it was difficult for Subaru to relax as he was aware of her presence peering through the Magic Crystal.

And so, as the morning routine of being toyed with by the Witch came to an end—

???: "—Subaru-sama, are you awake?"

There was a knock on the door from outside, which informed him of his usual wake-up time.

Subaru cleared his throat slightly as he heard the gentle voice which had called to him. Then, clapping his hands to his face, and using the mirror to once again reshape his face into a smile, he gave a very unspirited reply of "Come innn".

???: "Good morning, Subaru-sama. Today is once again a splendid morning, you know."

Hearing that reply and entering the room was a smiling girl in a maid's uniform—Subaru's maid, Petra Leyte.

When he had first met her, she was still a young bud who had yet to flower; but now, she was entering a season of growth, and was in the process of blooming beautifully. Her height, arms, and legs had grown compared to before, and she was becoming increasingly well-suited to her pretty maid dress, too.

Her behavior and mannerisms, as well, were not lost against her adorable outfit. From the start, she was a girl who was well-taught and quick to learn. And now, as a maid, Petra had reached top-notch levels.

A fourteen-year-old flower—seeing the smile of the all grown-up Petra, Subaru replied with a smile.

Subaru: “Good mornin’, Petra. I agree with you… it’s indeed a splendid morning. I’m pretty happy that I was able to see Petra’s cute face again this morning.”

Petra: “Subaru-sama’s still saying such things… Ah, but there are clouds hanging over the sky beyond the forest, and it seems that the weather may get worse this afternoon. I have plans to go shopping this afternoon, so I hope it’ll stay sunnyyy.”

Inclining her head in response to Subaru’s greeting, Petra turned her eyes towards the window and muttered that out. In those words, there was a faint trace of her childish immaturity, and Subaru gave a small chuckle.

Petra: “Ah! No, Subaru-sama, why are you laughing?”

Subaru: “No, no, it’s that just now, you broke out of your beautiful maid shell for a moment. How very Petra-like.”

Petra: “Jeez, please stop treating me like a kid that way. I’m totally grown up. I’ve been a maid already for two years… because of that, I’ve become an adult!”

Shaking her auburn hair, Petra’s cheeks blushed and her lips pouted in embarrassment. Before the figure of his cute little sister, Subaru smiled and stroked the girl’s head.

Petra’s eyes narrowed happily at that touch, and she let out a reluctant sigh.

Petra: “So, what will you be doing this morning? It’s still too early for breakfast, but…”

Subaru: “Ahh, for the time being, I’ll just finish my usual routine, and then if it goes well, we can have breakfast with everyone. If it doesn’t go well… then, the usual.”

Petra: “…Right.”

Casting her eyes down slightly at Subaru’s reply, Petra made quite a serious face. Not able to bear seeing such a sweet girl make such a face, Subaru scratched his head, Subaru: “Anyhow, thank you for today as well. Especially for coming to wake me up.”

Petra: “…”

Subaru: “Petra?”

Petra: “Subaru-sama, you really are careless.”

Saying that to Subaru, who awkwardly tried to change the topic, Petra gave an exasperated sigh. And then, the girl shook her head, putting on a smile like a bloomed flower,

Petra: “No, even this is my job. Besides, it’s very easy to handle because Subaru-sama never really sleeps in… It would be fine, even if you were a little less disciplined, but…”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Petra: “It’s nothing. Well then, I’ll see you later. Pardon me.”

Every morning, after acting as Subaru’s alarm clock, Petra would hold her skirt politely in a curtsy. And then, after seeing off Subaru, she would leave the room.

The door would close, and Subaru would nod his head in satisfaction at Petra’s growth.

Subaru: “Petra has become so splendid. As a big brother, I’m proud.”

Echidna: “But from her perspective, she does not seem to think of you as an elder brother.”

Subaru: “…I tell you to keep silent except for when I need you, and then this happens. The great Witch sure is quick to break her promises.”

As she responded to his soliloquy, Subaru was astonished by the Witch’s lack of patience and inability to tolerate silence. But, letting out a sigh of resignation, looking towards the door through which Petra had disappeared, Subaru: “I’m that girl’s big brother, you know? So, that makes Petra my cute little sister. That’s why I will make that girl happy. —That much I will absolutely do.”

Echidna: “You shall absolutely make her happy, you say…? Contrary to what you might think, that may be a dreadful statement.”

Hearing Subaru’s firm tone, Echidna said this without poking any fun at him.

Ignoring the words of the Witch, Subaru stretched a little before leaving the room.

The corridors of the mansion were quite chilly with the air of the early morning; shivering, Subaru shrugged off the cold and set out.

—His daily “routine” was about to start.

4

Since a few months ago, mornings in the Roswaal mansion would begin with an intense “Death Match”.

Though, calling it a “Death Match” might have been quite surprising for those involved.

Still, for Subaru, who would witness it from the sidelines, the exchanges were violent enough to be called a “Death Match”.

In fact, one of the two who clashed together must have challenged with the intent to kill.

But unfortunately, the opposing party evaded that ferocious fighting spirit with ease. The disparity of power between the two of them was completely evident in the eyes of anyone who cared to look.

Of course, there was no doubt that they would keep up this dangerous routine every morning due to this reason.

???: “RHHHHAAAAARRRGH!!”

There was a fierce howl of rage, accompanied by an explosive kick that blew away the lawn on the courtyard.

Digging their foot in deeply, with that tempestuous propulsion the golden silhouette charged forward, his beastly claws driving straight toward the figure of their opponent.

It was a blow that could rend thick steel plates, one which could turn a human body into minced meat—the claws of the beast delivered a myriad of violent attacks, assailing its prey in an attempt to forbid it from escaping.

However—

???: “I apologize, but the gap is too great.”

???: “GHHA—?!”

The other silhouette easily avoided the downpour of fatal attacks coming from the claws of the beast. And immediately after, their long legs sprung up, and the body of the beast was pierced from below.

The beast raised a cry in anguish at receiving that blow, and the body of the one who had set the trap arced upwards—

???: “GHHAGHK—?!”

—Or rather, that was what should have happened, but that was not what had transpired.

The body that had been launched skywards was intercepted by the opponent’s heel directly from above, sending them crashing down into the ground. The impact produced a circular crater upon the lawn’s surface, leaving the beast perfectly silent, sprawled out unmoving upon the ground.

They desperately tried to move their limbs, but the beast’s fighting spirit was extinguished.

???: “Do you wish to continue?”

???: “—Aurgh”

The victor asked them whether they wanted to proceed as the loser let out a groan.

There was neither sarcasm nor cynicism when asking that; they were words spoken only towards the other’s fighting spirit. That was why those words deeply wounded the loser’s pride.

Thus—

???: “You probably don’t even realize it, but words like that are demeaning, you know. Stop with the damn Samurai’s pity.”

Entering the scene in which the outcome had already been decided, Subaru interjected, scratching his head.

Hearing those words, the young man who had been overlooking his sprawled-out opponent turned to look back at him. The young man with hair red as a flame raised his hand towards Subaru, saying “Hello”.

???: “Good morning, Subaru. You’re up early this morning, no?”

Subaru: “Not as early as the two of you. Even so, don’t you get bored or fed up with having to do this everyday… you don’t have to always act so upright, Reinhard.”

Reinhard: “There’s nothing wrong with his ambition to become stronger. Besides, it’s also true that he’s strengthening his abilities day by day. Before long, won’t there come a time where he will have a good match with me?”

Subaru: “Is that so? …I’m having a bit of a hard time picturing that.”

So smiled the red-haired youth—Reinhard van Astrea.

Subaru tilted his head at the evaluation of this generation’s Sword Saint, the strongest man on earth. He meant not to belittle his morning training partner, but Reinhard’s assessment seemed overly modest.

Subaru had tried countless attempts, but he could not come up with a strategy to defeat Reinhard. No matter how many times he had Returned by Death, he could not envision a victory.

Perhaps the same applied for the person lying sprawled out on the ground.

???: "—Tch"

Having suffered significant damage, frowning was none other than Garfiel.

Wheezing in anguish, he was still unable to stand up but the fighting spirit dwelling in his emerald eyes had not wavered at all. However, the world was not so kind that a competitive spirit could have any effect on one's prowess.

Even if Garfiel's frustration had reached its limit, he would not be able to break Reinhard's cool demeanor.

That, too, was the observation of Natsuki Subaru, who had witnessed a wide variety of situations.

Subaru: "Your determination to take on the challenge is admirable. Hey, can you get up, Garfiel?"

Garfiel: "…Don't be touchin' me so casually. I don't need yer fuckin' hand ta stand up, ya know."

Shaking off Subaru's outstretched hand, Garfiel bared his fangs in disgust at him.

It was obvious that he was putting on a tough act, so Subaru quietly retracted his hand. Even if it was bravado, he would rather let his fangs break before he let that fact be exposed.

Ever since kneeling before the Great Rabbit, Garfiel refused to yield.

He continued to challenge Reinhard, despite knowing there was no chance of winning, all in an attempt to forget that defeat.

Echidna: "Such an adorable act of resistance."

Subaru: “Quit it. I won’t let you make fun of Garfiel.”

Echidna: “Huh?! I was not making fun of him at all…”

Subaru could only sigh at the surprised reaction of the wide-eyed wicked spirit within his head.

Then, he looked at the now-standing Garfiel, who had somehow managed to get up,

Subaru: “If you can stand up on your own, go take a bath before breakfast. Get rid of that sweat and mud, or Ram will come to dislike you.”

Garfiel: “…Shut yer trap. I already know that without ya needin’ ta tell me.”

Subaru: “And…”

Garfiel, his knees trembling, wrinkled his nose as Subaru added a comment.

His enmity towards the person who had crushed his dignity was laid bare. Facing that gaze, Subaru closed one eye,

Subaru: “You should visit Ryuzu-san’s place once in a while. Both Ryuzu-san and Shima-san were worried about you.”

Garfiel: “—Tsk”

Subaru: “You can be stubborn all you want. But, if you let people worry about you because of it…”

Garfiel: “Shut the fuck up!”

And, at those sermon-like words, Subaru’s collar was roughly seized by Garfiel.

Garfiel then attempted to hoist Subaru up.

However—

Reinhard: “Garfiel, do not go any further. Subaru is going to get hurt.”

In an instant, Reinhard intervened, restraining Garfiel’s arm.

Reinhard, who had somehow managed to get his hand off of Subaru’s chest, looked at Garfiel sternly and lowered his eyebrows.

Reinhard: “If that were to happen, Ram-san would be terribly angry with you.”

Garfiel: “If y’all’re thinkin’ my amazin’ self’d back down just ‘cause I get told to, you’re dead wrong.”

Subaru: “Cough, we can’t help that it’s the most effective method. Ah, ugh.”

Having both Subaru and Reinhard consecutively refer to Ram, Garfiel clenched his teeth in annoyance. Chuckling at the situation, Subaru briefly placed a hand to his throat, which was in pain for a moment, and lightly coughed to adjust his tone.

Subaru: “Phew… even though the bit about Ram getting angry is a joke, if people get hurt, then morning practice might have to be banned. If that happens, it won’t be good for you, either.”

Garfiel: “Grr…”

Reinhard: “Garfiel, I will always be here with you. I know you swore a vow to not see your family until you are satisfied with yourself, but…”

Staring at Garfiel, who was gnashing his teeth, Reinhard quietly shook his head.

Within those blue eyes that captured the azure sky, there was a hint of loneliness, as he said,

Reinhard: “But, you should meet with your cherished ones, and exchange words with them while you can still see them. If you regret it after they are gone, there’s no getting that back.”

Garfiel: “…”

The pupils of Garfiel's emerald eyes narrowed as he listened to Reinhard's heartfelt words.

And then—

Garfiel: "Next time, I'm gonna fuckin' beat ya."

With that, he shook off Reinhard's grip on his arm and turned away.

As he walked away in a disgruntled manner, Reinhard called out "I will be looking forward to it", a sincere cheer devoid of sarcasm.

Subaru: "But, the lack of sarcasm actually makes it sound kind of sarcastic."

Reinhard: "I wonder about that. Do you think Garfiel was offended again?"

Subaru: "Nah, as far as he's concerned, he's got a lot more hate for me than for you, so I don't think you need to worry about that at all."

As they watched Garfiel depart from the courtyard, Subaru shrugged his shoulders. In response, Reinhard adjusted his collar with one hand and chuckled.

The slight disarrangement of his collar was the only trace of their morning training that Garfiel had managed to leave behind.

Subaru: "…After destroying the courtyard like this, I can understand why he's frustrated."

Reinhard: "Still, I think it's going to take a while. I can't help but feel bad about it too. After all—"

At that point, Reinhard paused, his gaze turning to the marks Garfiel had left on the lawn.

Reinhard: "He's avoiding visiting his grandmother, who lives apart from him, until he can defeat me."

Subaru: "I understand the logic, but he messed up his goal setting…

his own lack of strength seems to have hit him pretty hard. It's understandable that he is stubborn. Just…"

Reinhard: "Just?"

Subaru: "I think you are a part of the reason for that stubbornness."

When Subaru firmly pointed a finger at him, Reinhard nodded his head in agreement.

There was something to recall here. It was also an event that created an insurmountable rift between Reinhard and Garfiel.

To put it simply, it was when Reinhard found out about Garfiel's vow.

Subaru: "That was why you went easy on him, to help him achieve his goal."

Reinhard: "It was a mistake, and I deeply regret it too. I should have handled it better."

Subaru: "As long as you're thinking like that, no matter how hard you try, it won't work."

While Reinhard regretted the method he had used, it also became a significant point of reflection for Subaru.

The rift that was created between Reinhard and Garfiel was one of Subaru's failures, a mistake that he could not redo—the incident that happened just before Subaru's Return by Death checkpoint, an irreparable mistake.

Echidna: "It was a trivial matter, so it did not hinder us later on."

Subaru: "Because of that, Ryuzu-san and the others were left feeling lonely."

Knowing that Reinhard had been holding back, Garfiel's stubbornness only intensified.

As a result, the intensity of the morning practice, and the ferocity of the young tiger, grew stronger with each passing day.

Subaru: “In this case, it’s not about who’s at fault.”

Reinhard: “Just now, I thought you clearly said it was my fault.”

Subaru: “It’s a figure of speech! If we start pointing fingers, that stubborn Garfiel would be the one most at fault for sure.”

However, not being able to solve Garfiel’s stubbornness was also a sign of Subaru and the others’ powerlessness.

It was a painful realization. Even if he accumulated Deaths and reached for the best outcome he could, he still would not be able to prevent every single slight scratch, and wounds might still fester.

Subaru: “So, please continue to accompany him for a while.”

Reinhard: “I understand. Like I said earlier, his actual abilities are improving. It’s good that he learns quickly. —The courtyard’s destruction was worth it.”

With a composed expression, Reinhard’s concern was directed at the state of the ruined courtyard.

Garfiel had challenged him with a glaring intent to kill, but to Reinhard, this all might have been but child’s play. The day that Garfiel’s vow would be fulfilled remained distant.

In front of Subaru, Reinhard walked slowly across the destroyed lawn. And, as if by some unknown principle, wherever his footsteps touched, the ruined meadow began to recover.

Perhaps this was also the power of the countless Divine Protections he possessed; Subaru scratched his cheek at the casual miracle.

However, it was not just extraordinary power that defined Reinhard. This was what was so terrifying about him.

Echidna: “Given that, I would say that bringing him into your camp can be considered your finest play to this point. I, too, was surprised by your skill.”

Reading Subaru's feelings, Echidna chimed in with her own comment. However, Subaru could not help but nod in agreement. Undoubtedly, it was one of Subaru's greatest achievements.

—The Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea.

Currently, he was a Knight affiliated with the Emilia Camp, backed by Roswaal.

Shortly after the Royal Selection had started, the Sword Saint had become Felt's Knight. He had been the greatest adversary he would have had to contend with, and because of his distinguished prominence in the Kingdom, he would have been their greatest threat, but—

Reinhard: "Subaru?"

Subaru: "Oh sorry, I was kinda spaced out. You always amaze me, no matter how many times I see you."

Reinhard: "It's just the Divine Protection of Vegetation. It's something that revitalizes the life force of plants and flowers."

Subaru: "Calling it "just" is already quite something. But, looking at it this way…"

Subaru cracked his neck while Reinhard nonchalantly explained the miracle of his Divine Protection. Then, after a deliberate pause, he uttered the words that followed.

Those were—

Subaru: "If Felt were to return, I can't help but feel heavy-hearted at the thought of opposing you again."

Reinhard: "…"

Subaru: "Reinhard?"

Subaru, as he spoke calmly and without any pretense, furrowed his brow. In response, Reinhard shook his head, "No".

With a slight hint of melancholy upon his perfectly sculpted profile, the Sword Saint, the embodiment of miracles, lowered his gaze.

Reinhard: “I appreciate your concern, but I dare say I would be unable to go back to being Felt-Sama’s Knight. That lady has rejected me and judged me as unworthy. Were it not so, she wouldn’t have tossed me aside to vanish to whereabouts unknown.”

Reinhard faintly revealed a sense of regret and loneliness. It seemed that he wanted to say he had come to terms with it, but it was obvious that he had not yet sorted it out.

Witnessing Reinhard’s pained expression, Subaru cursed his own wickedness.

—Already, nearly a year had passed since Reinhard’s master, one of the Royal Selection Candidates, Felt, had disappeared from her Knight.

The girl, tough as a stray cat, had left the Astrea House, taking with her only the old man she regarded as family, and ran away from the Royal Selection. Thus, she cast aside the Sword Saint who had pledged himself to her.

Those were the rumors circulating among the public, and were almost identical to the truth.

In fact, Reinhard had heard nothing from Felt, before being abruptly driven from the Royal Selection. Having been abandoned by the master to whom he had sworn his loyalty, it was not difficult to imagine the sense of helplessness he must have felt.

Subaru had extended his arm out to this, and had dragged him over to this new camp.

With his conscience sullied, Reinhard had taken Subaru’s desperate plea, and offered his sword to Emilia as his new lord. And since, the Sword Saint had become the sword of the Emilia Camp, playing a key role in the Royal Selection.

Echidna: “He is the descendant of the Sword Saint who had sealed away the Witch of Envy. It is significant that he stated that he would support the candidate who is despised as a Half-Devil. It is enough to overturn her unfavorable reputation."

As Echidna pointed out, Reinhard's inclusion drastically altered the dynamics of the Royal Selection.

With the departure of the Felt Camp, and the weakening of the Crusch Camp, the position of the Emilia Camp was greatly strengthened, putting them on par with the Camps of Anastasia and Priscilla.

Truly, it was a situation shaped by Reinhard's involvement.

Even if—

Echidna: "—Even if it was done by none other than your behest."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "I guess it's "Ignorance is bliss", as they say in your world's proverbs."

Subaru ignored the teasing and probing words of Echidna that echoed in his mind.

Instead, he gave Reinhard a smile of concern, lifting the corners of his mouth slightly, and lightly patted the slumped shoulders of his friend. With just a glance at Reinhard's profile as he turned his gaze away, Subaru uttered, "Don't worry about it."

Subaru: "I can't just easily say that I understand how you feel. However, you've been a big help to me. Otherwise, I don't know how many times Garfiel would have beaten me up."

"That was a close call earlier, too," replied Reinhard with an open smile. Finally, the tension eased from his expression.

Reinhard: "No matter how you look at it, that seems like a groundless worry. Indeed, Garfiel's attitude towards you is harsh, Subaru, but… that is the flip side of him recognizing your strength. However, your strength lies apart from physical power. That's something Garfiel cannot openly express."

Subaru: “You’re being way too generous with your words… And, I’ve done enough to Garfiel to deserve a grudge.”

Subaru felt sorry for Reinhard, who did not know the whole story, but Garfiel had valid reasons to dislike Subaru. Even Subaru did not know if a day would come where the snow would thaw.

His recklessness in signing a Contract with Echidna and working to liberate the Sanctuary had only been possible by ruining and trampling upon the days Garfiel had accumulated.

From Garfiel’s perspective, being left completely out of a crisis in his own homeland and finding out that even his trusted grandmother had cooperated behind his back —Subaru could only guess at how he felt, but any sympathy on his part would be nothing more than hypocrisy.

As a result, the Sanctuary was saved without any sacrifices.

But Garfiel, too, could not do anything either. That was the crux of the matter.

Without the persuasion of Ram, Frederica, and Ryuzu, Garfiel might not have even joined the Emilia Camp. If that had happened, the camp would have lost a crucial force until Reinhard joined, and that would have been a huge loss.

Subaru: “No…”

And, biting his molars at his own thoughts, Subaru forcefully pressed his fist against his forehead.

He was reflecting on how he had failed to grasp Garfiel’s emotions and could not help but feel apologetic. But how did this take him to the position of seeing Garfiel as nothing more than a battle asset?

Did Garfiel despise Subaru because he could see through this thinking?

Subaru: “But, could that too be resolved if he continues to practice with Reinhard?”

The crux of Garfiel's resentment lay in his own lack of strength.

If that was the case, then by setting Reinhard as a clear goal, learning about the strength of the Sword Saint, and gradually getting closer, would things change little by little? Would he be able to forgive Subaru someday?

Would the wounds that Subaru was unable to prevent in the Sanctuary eventually heal?

Subaru: "If that's what it takes to get him to open up to me, then it'll be worth it."

Reinhard: "Surely, one day he will understand your feelings, Subaru. There's no need to be impatient."

Reinhard shook his head, gesturing consolation at Subaru's half-hearted conclusion. And then, the red-haired Knight turned his eyes towards the mansion,

Reinhard: "I want you to leave Garfiel to me for just a little while longer… That's if you still have any expectations from me, the one who was not even able to acquire Felt-sama's trust."

Subaru: "Don't be so pitiful. If I can't trust in you, who can I trust?. Yeah, I've got expectations for you."

Reinhard: "Understood. Then, you too should do what is expected of you. —That is the duty of the One and Only Knight."

It was only in those parting words that Reinhard had shown some kind of emotion.

The One and Only Knight—that term was only permitted in master-servant relationships that were tied together by the strongest of bonds. Reinhard had not been able to become that for Felt.

He didn't wish for Subaru to turn out the same way; that was the feeling being expressed.

Reinhard: "Well then, I will see you later."

Without even revealing such sentimentality on his facial expression, Reinhard gave Subaru a clap on his shoulder and left the garden. Behind him, as we walked away, the landscaping, which was supposed to have been razed to the ground, was completely restored.

Standing on the grass, Subaru made sure that Reinhard had completely left, and let out a long sigh.

Considering the lie he had just told, feeling repugnance might have been more accurate than a sigh.

Subaru: “How dare I even…”

Echidna: “My, what a magnificent acting performance. Your skin grows thicker by the day.”

Subaru: “…”

Once again, he heard the voice of the Witch who kept breaking her promise, but Subaru had nothing to say to her observation.

Taking his silence as permission to speak, Echidna transmitted her thought-waves from the Magic Crystal,

Echidna: “Hey, hey, no need to be so down. To begin with, were you not the one who brought up Reinhard in the first place? That you needed a sword to oppose the Witch Cult?”

Subaru: “I’m aware. I was the one who planned it, and the one who executed it.”

Echidna: “Originally, that girl—Felt had no interest in the Royal Selection in the slightest. So, she jumped at the chance when she was offered an escape route with no consequences. Of course, you made a few threats about revealing the identity of that old giant man. But, it was only the difference between early or late.”

Whether it was meant as consolation or not, Echidna’s remarks carefully peeled away Subaru’s pressure scabs.

Reinhard, who had encouraged him in vain, had nothing to do with the reason as to why Felt had abandoned him. All of it was the result of Natsuki Subaru's secret machinations.

If the truth were to be discovered, scorn and denunciation would be inevitable.

Echidna: "In order to save your beloved girlfriend, you needed strength to fight off the Witch Cult's malice. No one can be saved by charm alone. You made the correct judgment. It was a neccessary choice"

Subaru: "Shut up."

Echidna: "The damage to the Watergate City was kept to a minimum because of that choice. How could you have resisted the disaster that befell such a populated city without Reinhard?"

Echidna's words, accreting on top of each other, cut Subaru like a blade rather than comforting him.

The deceptions that were laid out to justify his actions were naught but piles of filth to Subaru. An ordeal he had to accept, swallow, and store as his own nourishment.

The Trial that he thought he had overcome at the tomb seemed to be continuing in the outside world.

—To save everything, strength was needed.

The memories of the future and the experiences he possessed were insufficient to cover the despair that existed in this world.

If he had been able to compromise, he might have been able to overcome his hardships more easily. However, Subaru could not be so strong or weak to tolerate self-sacrifice for the sake of sacrifice.

To accept giving up, to permit compromise, to turn a blind eye to sacrifices, there would be no point in that.

If he were to stop weighing his own life on the scales, the meaning of taking the Witch's hand would disappear.

Therefore, he had been working tirelessly to gather the necessary strength, to gather the necessary forces.

Echidna: “As a result, you have entrapped Reinhard van Astrea, and won him over to your side.”

To accomplish this, it was necessary for Felt to withdraw from the Royal Selection—the trial and errors that had accreted for this reason made the struggle against Clind seem almost endearing.

How difficult must it have been for him, to deceive Reinhard under his watchful eyes?

It was more difficult than deceiving any other existence in this world.

Echidna: “But, you did it. In the end, not a single person was harmed.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “By now, she should be living peacefully together with her family in Kararagi. I am sure that this is the best thing for her as well. The fate of her blood is a harsh one for her.”

This scenario imagined by Echidna, in fact, brought no solace to Subaru.

If there was only one thing that could save Subaru from his diabolical scheming, it was the indisputable fact that no one had been harmed.

Only that outcome could be salvation for Natsuki Subaru.

It did not matter how many times his heart would be wounded, so long as he could save their lives—.

Subaru: “Where there is life… there is a future. Where there is a future, there is hope. Where there is hope, there is possibility. Where there is possibility—”

Echidna: “—People can be saved. You are correct. You are not wrong. I can guarantee so.”

Subaru: “I don’t particularly need your guarantees, you know…”

Subaru spoke out his innermost thoughts to both cheer himself up, and to caution himself.

The Witch affirmed, understood, shared, and admired that.

While he responded aggressively to those words, it was a fact that he had been saved by the Witch’s words.

—Life, was life.

If he was alive, he could start over. He had possibilities. It yielded hope.

Sacrifices were things that were different to Subaru’s life. It was worth continuing to always use Return by Death all the time if it protected everyone except for Subaru’s own life, which was no longer included in his calculations.

—Even if those whom I wish to save weep, I still wish to save them.

That was the salvation that Subaru had decided to receive by taking the Witch’s hand.

5

Having received the Witch of Greed’s cruel comfort, Subaru left the courtyard.

Witnessing the morning exercises of Reinhard and Garfiel had nothing to do with Subaru’s daily routine; it was just a passing event he had witnessed.

Subaru’s real daily routine was—

Subaru: “—Heya, Beatrice. Sorry to intrude.”

Opening the door at the easternmost part of the mansion, Subaru did not need his sixth sense like before.

That was because this place would never move from where it was again.

Behind the heavy door, greeted by the scent of paper, Subaru closed one eye at the familiar sight. It was a library with a large number of bookshelves lined up and books crammed into the space.

Among the unchanged scenery, there was one thing that was distinctly different from before.

It was the absence of the librarian of the archives, who should have rushed him right as he entered. Sitting on a stepladder, a space where there should have been a young girl waiting with a disgruntled expression to welcome him; however, neither the girl he was waiting for, nor her words of welcome, were present.

Subaru: “…”

There, curled up in the corner of the room, was a little girl clutching her knees; a sense of loneliness emanated from her.

He should have grown accustomed to this sight, of her resting with her head on her lap, yet it still pained his heart to see her as she was now, compared to the girl he used to know.

Unchanged in her attire, unchanged in her form, only her way of being had completely shifted from before—Beatrice, there without even a hint of movement.

She slumbered not. That fact was evident from how her fingers hugged her knees with so much force that they were whitened.

The Beatrice who used to greet Subaru with a seemingly grumpy demeanor, yet proudly introducing herself as the librarian; her dignified posture, backed by pride and responsibility; she had lost every trace of her former self.

Narrowing his eyes at her appearance, Subaru briefly let an emotion pass through his chest before blinking it away. Then, he put on a cheerfully idiotic smile, and threw open the curtains of the library.

This place, once called the Forbidden Library, was an isolated space separated from reality.

However, as a result of Beatrice, the librarian, abandoning her role and relinquishing the concealment of the space via Door Crossing, it had manifested itself in reality, looking just like an ordinary room.

A breeze blew the curtains open, causing the light from outside to pour in from the window.

Nature that was previously absent in the former Forbidden Library, now boldly crossing the threshold.

Subaru: “Heyyy, Beako. Today’s another splendid morning. There’s a pleasant breeze blowing by. Isn’t it about time you stopped hiding in this musty old room and went outside to play?”

Beatrice: “…”

Subaru: “If you don’t want to muddy your dress up by playing outside, then at the very least, let’s eat together with everyone. Come to the dining hall like before. It’s not too much to ask, right?”

Beatrice: “…”

With the window and curtains wide open, Subaru smiled warmly with the sunshine and breeze on his back.

However, despite his candid invitation, Beatrice remained silent with her face hidden. The girl, clutching her knees tightly, almost seemed like she was punishing herself in Subaru’s eyes.

Subaru: “Hey, Beako…”

Beatrice: “…Just shut the hell up, in fact.”

Subaru: “…”

Unable to bear the sight of her, Subaru tried to approach her, but Beatrice spoke out.

Her voice sank heavily, growing hoarse. But, after hearing her voice, Subaru felt happy. Because, recently, just hearing her voice was a rare occurrence.

So, even though her words were a solemn refusal, it made Subaru feel content.

Casting aside Subaru's thoughts, Beatrice continued without raising her face.

Beatrice: "Betty is tired. She's already given up, I suppose. Going against Mother's instructions… breaking the Contract… and despite that, still being alive… why?"

Subaru: "Beatrice…"

Beatrice: "You, if only you had just abandoned me back then… why, why did you come to help me, in fact…? Who even asked you, you, who are not even That Person… hk!"

It was a resentment that would never disappear, a grudge that could never fade, a penitence that she could never forgive—.

In her four hundred years, Beatrice had bore those feelings alone, yet her heroic determination that had refused to relinquish such thoughts had been trampled upon, naturally bringing hatred.

Within the Forbidden Library, there was a Spirit who was prepared to abandon her mission; but, despite her resolve, she was spared.

Her eternal life had stripped hope from her, and all she had been given was time to live a life devoid of meaning.

Having relinquished the responsibility of managing the closed-off Forbidden Library, the long, long thread that had held Beatrice together finally snapped. and she had been left imprisoned in the death she had been prepared for. As a result, Beatrice was trapped in the Death she had prepared for.

She had given up her mission, thrown it away, and betrayed the mother who had believed in her.

The atonement for that was something she could no longer achieve herself. She had completely given up on that.

The weight of her strong sense of responsibility had become chains, binding the small Beatrice's soul.

Ever since the night she gave up her mission, she had spent endless hours crouched in a corner of the library, crying without end.

Even so—

Beatrice: "—hk! Go away! Let go, I suppose! Don't you touch Betty… tch!"

Unable to bear seeing her small figure in such a state, Subaru wrapped her body into a hug.

Shouting at him as he embraced her, Beatrice made no attempt to hide her disgust and rage, scoring Subaru's neck with her nails. Caught in her merciless attack, drops of blood oozed out of his wounds. But still, he would not let go.

He hugged her in an attempt to comfort her diminutive, shivering body.

But, perhaps it was actually Subaru who sought comfort in that act.

Beatrice: "Why, why did you come to see me, I suppose…! You're so, you're so…!"

Subaru: "No matter how many times you vent your anger at me, I'll be here. Even if the flames of regret don't seem like they're vanishing right now, if you keep pouring them out, maybe they'll vanish someday."

Beatrice: "They're not, supposed to vanish, in fact…! Betty is!"

Subaru: "I'm so glad that you're alive. So, I'll always look forward to the day where you'll stand before me with a pout once again. —That hope is there, because you are still alive."

Beatrice: "—hk"

After those gentle, sincere words were spoken, Beatrice's resistance subsided.

Without moving, Beatrice looked stunned, but then absently began to sob. It was a sign that she would no longer be able to continue this conversation.

—Once every two weeks, Subaru and Beatrice would exchange temper and stillness in such a way.

After releasing her from his embrace, Beatrice once again buried her forehead into her knees. And, after that, Subaru had nothing more to say to the girl who had retreated into her own shell.

Subaru's words still were unable to manage open the door to her Beatrice's heart.

Nevertheless, if he beat relentlessly against that door, maybe one day, they would open. —The mere possibility of this hope, was hope itself.

Subaru: "…Back then, I wonder if I should have lied and told her I was That Person."

Exiting the library and leaving Beatrice behind, whilst leaning his back to the door, Subaru recollected this.

Holding out hope that Subaru was indeed That Person, after the attack on the mansion, Beatrice had been prepared for the end of her long, long mission. However, both hope and resignation betrayed her.

For four hundred years, a girl eagerly longed for the arrival of That Person to take her away from the Forbidden Library. Should Subaru have deceived her, and lied about being That Person?

If he had done so, would her heart have been saved, and would she have relinquished the Forbidden Library with a smile on her face?

Subaru: "The book in that room…"

Echidna: "Beatrice has relinquished her role as librarian and has released the Forbidden Library. At that moment, all the books in the library turned blank. It was designed that way from the outset."

Subaru: “…You do some seriously ill-natured things.”

Echidna: “It is simply a precautionary measure. If Beatrice were to be killed, I could not let the library be stolen.”

Beatrice continued to sit in the library, which no longer possessed any value or reason to protect.

As if to irritate Subaru and his feelings for her, Echidna revealed the truth in a matter-of-fact manner. It was a precaution to prevent Beatrice from being killed—no, it was a precautionary measure to prevent knowledge from leaking out.

In the end, the feelings of Beatrice, who had been thinking of her mother for four hundred years, and the feelings that Echidna had induced, were vastly different.

Echidna: “Of course, the fact that the Forbidden Library is lost cannot be undone. Accepting the irretrievable loss of knowledge without inheritance is quite painful for me, but it cannot be helped. Though for you, compared to that knowledge, that Beatrice’s life was saved is what matters most, is it not?”

Subaru: “—Hk! If you hadn’t told her to wait for That Person…!”

Echidna: “Wait a second; no matter how you look at it, is that not sidestepping logic? I had my own reasons. Of course, responsibility for Beatrice’s long solitude does fall upon my shoulders. But, my intent was certainly not one of forcing misfortune upon that child. I do hope you understand.”

Having received Echidna’s objections, Subaru, aware that he was taking his anger out on her, hesitated.

The Witch’s words were correct. In the end, when Subaru blamed Echidna, he was just shifting the responsibility from what he himself could not do.

Subaru: “…In the end, That Person; who was it?”

Echidna: “Regretfully, I cannot let that slip from my mouth. Since the Forbidden Library has lost its role, discussing it would be meaningless. Even if you were to find out who it was, he would not know about it anymore."

Subaru: "He… which means, it's a man?"

Echidna: "—. Did my mouth slip? But, every way of finding him is gone now. In the first place, assuming you were to find him, what would you do? Would you introduce him to Beatrice? Or, do you intend to impose a sanction on him? In that case, what would be the charge? The person in question would certainly be unaware of it; a crime that does not exist cannot be sanctioned. Moreover, it is not as if you have the leisure."

Irrefutable were Echidna's conversational tactics, leading Subaru to click his tongue.

As a matter of fact, everything spoken by the Witch was probably correct. He could not find any flaws. He could not judge them. Subaru did not have the time to do such a thing.

Echidna: "Beatrice truly did spend that time in pity. But, that is not to say that the future would remain so, and there is no indication for us to think thus. Incidentally, it is just as you said."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Even if devastated by regret right now, there will come a day where that child will be freed. When that happens, someone will come to accept that child. Perhaps someone that is you, perhaps someone that is not. That is the possibility that living offers."

It was sophistry. It was merely a front of benevolence.

But, that doubtlessly was also hope.

It seemed like cajolery from Echidna, but if there was that possibility, then Subaru had no choice but to believe her words.

Thus Subaru, no matter how clear it was that the Witch with whom he was contracted was verbally toying with him, he could not deny her point. He could only cling to it, rely on it.

On her, as his only accomplice, keeping Subaru aware of his sins, allowing him not to forget was her presence.

Subaru: “Just like parallel lines.”

Echidna: “Ah, like parallel lines indeed.”

In the end, finishing their conversation thus, was Subaru and Echidna’s manner of confronting their sins.

Entrusting hope to the future, believing in the paths to possibility, awaiting the arrival of the ideal day.

It mattered not how many chances he had, Subaru would always find himself back in this place.

Knowing that Beatrice had relinquished her mission, had been prepared to face Death, and had entrusted her last hope to Subaru, only to be betrayed and to break down in tears day after day, he still wanted her to live.

Thus, clinging onto hope, he kept walking forward through thick and thin, through thick and thin.

—That he will be saved. That he was saved.

Today as well, he made these words his motivation for the future; he prayed that hope would flourish.

6

???: “Oh myyy~, but if it isn’t Subaru-saaama~! On your way back from visiting Beatrice?”

Subaru: “…”

Suddenly, Subaru heard a voice from behind him as he walked through the corridor, causing him to reflexively stop in his tracks.

He instantaneously recognized the speaker from the tone and cadence of his voice. For that reason, he regretted stopping, but he could not ignore it as he had already stopped walking.

He turned around in displeasure, and directly behind Subaru stood the other figure, leisurely.

Subaru: “Roswaal, huh?”

Roswaal: “Mhhm, that’s me of course. Good morning. How was Beatrice today?”

Subaru: “…It’s been a while since she’s treated me so haughtily. Well, anticipate some progress from now on.”

Roswaal: “I see… Looks like you took quite the beeeating~, though?”

Roswaal narrowed his differently colored eyes as he received Subaru’s dispirited reply.

His gaze was fixed upon Subaru’s neck. There, were the painful scratches Beatrice had given him with her nails a short while ago.

Roswaal: “Unfortunately, I’ve never been skilled at treating injuries, and I won’t be able to heal those wounds. The only ones capable of using Healing Magic are… Beatrice, Garfiel, and Emilia-sama.”

Subaru: “The first two would be a bit difficult to ask. I could ask Emilia… well, I’ll think about it.”

Roswaal: “If you were to ask her, I am sure she’d definitely heal you right up. Or perhaps, could it be that to you, the ache of these wounds provide some sort of comfort?”

Subaru: “…”

In place of the reticent Subaru, each of Roswaal’s discursive words were as painfully sharp as a razor.

The last comment in particular hit him directly. Subaru narrowed his eyes, and so Roswaal shrugged his shoulders in a clown-like gesture, blatantly feigning ignorance.

The clownish makeup and exotic attire, Roswaal’s appearance and attitude had in no way changed—his way of interacting with Subaru, his respectful and admiring attitude, had also remained the same.

Roswaal respected Subaru, acknowledging him as his savior.

He understood that salvation could be brought about in any manner, and accepted it with understanding.

Roswaal: “No need to worry, Subaru-sama. If you make use of your time, I am sure you’ll find a solution; no matter what the method, you will dedicate yourself to finding the optimal way. If your desire is to save Beatrice’s heart, such a method will one day fall within your grasp. There’s no need at all to feel aaanxious~.”

Subaru: “You make it sound so easy. There’s no way it’ll be that convenient.”

Roswaal: “You’re too modest. —Besides, I don’t think that it’s easy, either. But, that mere fact doesn’t cloud all of your achievements to date, that’s all I was saying.”

Bowing reverently, Roswaal gave thorough praise for Subaru’s achievements.

As a matter of fact, only Echidna, who was contracted with Subaru, knew about his Authority of Return by Death. But, Roswaal had an understanding of his Authority to be similar to Redoing. Roswaal evaluated that fact and his achievements together.

As Echidna held no tangible power, it was no exaggeration to say that Roswaal valued and supported Subaru the most in the truest sense.

Roswaal: “At the Royal Capital, at my mansion, and once again at the Royal Capital. And then, at the Sanctuary, and the Watergate City. —You have made it this far without letting anything slip through your fingers. Indisputable are your achievements, feats you alone have accomplished. There will come a day when you will fulfill my long-cherished wish, and for that I offer my utmost support. Please make full use of it.”

Subaru: “You sure are optimistic… Don’t be so sure that I’ll dance on the palm of your hand."

Roswaal: "But, you desire the blood of the Dragon. Without it, that girl—Rem will never awaken. Having reached that conclusion, you need Emilia-sama to become King. Isn't that right?"

Roswaal gave him a low, searching expression, and Subaru in kind returned a sharp, cold look.

It was a relationship of mutual cooperation, established on choppy waters, in which both of them knew each other's critical points.

Roswaal would accomplish his goal by utilizing Subaru's Return by Death, all the while putting Subaru in situations whereby he must gradually achieve this.

And though Subaru knew of those intentions, for the sake of saving the still-slumbering Rem, he had no choice but to advance them.

Roswaal: "Oh, but it won't be a bad deal. You do your thing, I'll do mine, and in any case, we'll both have our desires become reality. To that end, we'll make use of each other. That's all there is to it."

Subaru: "…"

Roswaal: "My strength should prove useful. I've devoted nearly four hundred years anticipating this occasion. And for me, your power will be the same, isn't that so?"

Subaru could give no objections to Roswaal's conviction.

He had arrived at that answer when he had discovered Roswaal's treachery all the way back at the Sanctuary.

Whether for the sake of the Royal Selection, or as a means of blocking against coming hindrances, being without Roswaal's presence was absolutely unallowable for Subaru and the camp.

Even if he was just planning on using Subaru to materialize his own wishes.

Subaru: "If you were honest about your true intentions and just told me what you wanted, maybe I would help you without being so stubborn.”

Roswaal: “What a shame, I’m afraid that’s impossible. You would never choose that path.”

Whenever Subaru would try to approach him even in the slightest, Roswaal would immediately push him away.

This familiar exchange brought a wry smile to Subaru’s lips, and Roswaal chuckled ostentatiously.

Roswaal: “Especially if you’re not conscious of it yourself. You always push forward with your sole priority. Any obstructions, anything or anyone that could cause you to stumble; regardless of the circumstances, you will discard even their dearest wishes. You can do that. You have proven it. This all has already been decided, hence why you’ve become my trump card.”

Subaru: “…”

Roswaal: “Isn’t this wonderful? I’ll take care of my side, you’ll take care of yours, freely fulfilling our wishes. If it’s impossible even like this, that merely indicates that the one with unfulfilled wishes lacked sufficient desire.”

Subaru: “…Ah, is that so?”

Subaru already understood that Roswaal’s crazed dedication was what was supporting him.

And, the root from which it came, his refusal to speak candidly about it was also thus.

With this in mind, Subaru ended the conversation with Roswaal, and finally started to walk away. With a posture that showed just how much Roswaal was detached from his heart, as Roswaal yet stood still,

Roswaal: “Ahhh, yes. Right about now, Ram should be in Rem’s room. I’m letting you know, just in case.”

Subaru: "…"

Unable to respond, Subaru rounded the corner and escaped from his gaze.

7

—The Contract with the Witch at the Sanctuary fundamentally changed Natsuki Subaru's way of existence.

It was a transformation of the world as Subaru perceived it, the world as he experienced it, and the world as he walked through it; he was destined to no longer live the same way he had before.

Naturally, it was inevitable that countless changes would come to Subaru both within the mansion, which was his base of activities, and outside of it, but her change was perhaps the one that had the greatest impact and caused the most discomfort among the changes he experienced.

After all—

???: "—Thank you very much for going out of your way to visit my unworthy sister, Natsuki Subaru-sama."

Saying this, the one who bowed deeply to Subaru as he entered the room was a pink-haired maid—Ram, whose character was the very picture of arrogance and insolence.

Subaru: "…"

After the events at the Sanctuary and the subsequent commendation ceremony, Ram's attitude had shifted drastically, and she no longer approached Subaru with the same familiarity as before.

This new attitude, however, made Subaru feel extremely suffocated.

Ram: "—? Is something the matter, Natsuki Subaru-sama?"

Subaru: "…No, it's just that no matter how much time passes, I'll never get used to your attitude."

Ram: "…Again, many apologies for my prior rudeness. Ram's ignorance and lack of awareness caused great inconveniences to Natsuki Subaru-sama. But, since Roswaal-sama and Emilia-sama have given orders to show Natsuki-sama the utmost respect, that will not be the case again. Kindly rest assured."

Without changing her expression, Ram replied to Subaru in a manner any dignified maid ought to.

There was no trace of familiarity or sense of closeness which could have been interpreted as friendliness in her behavior, as there had been once before. Between Subaru and Ram, an invisible wall had emerged before he knew it.

—No, if there was a wall, then there would have been a way to scale it. Rather, there was no way of surmounting it; more precisely, it was an invisible gap.

Ram held Roswaal in high esteem, and adored him. When Roswaal had changed the way he acted towards Subaru, the value of Subaru's presence also changed dramatically for Ram.

The result was this current attitude, where she regarded Subaru as someone she respected.

Averting his gaze away from that Ram, Subaru approached the middle of the room—the reason why he had come to this room, the blue-haired girl who slept on a bed.

Lying on her back, her figure remained unchanged for over two years—that girl, was Rem.

He had made a vow to awaken her, and yet, he still had not achieved the conviction needed to fulfill that vow. Time alone was mercilessly leaving this girl behind.

Subaru: "Have there been any changes with Rem?"

Ram: "There have been none. She still continues to sleep… With so many other problems to deal with, Ram has no words to apologize for the worry her foolish sister has been causing you."

Subaru: “Don’t talk like that. Rem… thinking about Rem is absolutely not useless. Never say that again.”

Ram: “—Understood, sir.”

Ram responded curtly to Subaru’s firm order.

There was no dissatisfaction, nor complaint; no relief, nor gratitude.

In regards to her younger sister named Rem, Ram had no actual feelings or appreciation for her. Although she formally recognized that Rem was her sister, in the depths of her heart she probably had no room for Rem.

Her heart was completely centered on her loyalty to Roswaal.

This was heavily influenced by the actions of Subaru, who had made the choice to go along with Roswaal’s intentions, resulting in Ram’s cherished wish meeting its end.

Even if Rem were to awaken, would her heart once again have room for her little sister?

The older sister who was so adored, and the younger sister who was so doted upon: could these sisters ever return?

Subaru: “—Hk. Ram, I’m sorry, but I’d like to be alone with Rem.”

Ram: “…As you wish. Do call if you need anything.”

Grinding his teeth at the shuddering thought, Subaru felt terrified at being in the same room as Ram. Miraculously, before his trembling voice could escape, she removed her presence from the room.

Fortunately, Ram did not object to Subaru’s words, and instead bowed graciously and quietly headed for the door.

At the sound of her receding footsteps, Subaru let out a sigh of relief—

Ram: “—Ah, that’s right, Natsuki Subaru-sama.”

Subaru: “Wh-What is it? Did you forget to say something?”

Ram: “Yes. —Annerose-sama has sent a letter regarding Frederica’s condition.”

As Ram halted, Subaru was taken aback; her words that followed caused him to catch his breath.

The two names that were mentioned—Frederica and Annerose, neither of them were at the Roswaal mansion. Annerose, of course, was in her own mansion, and Frederica was accompanying her.

The official reason was to send her as a caretaker for Annerose, who had lost her steward. However, everyone, including Frederica herself, knew that it was in fact out of consideration for Frederica’s heart.

He had visited the Miload mansion several times, but Frederica’s stouthearted behaviour was painful to watch, and there was no prospect of her returning to be a maid at the Roswaal mansion.

Ram: “Apparently, she still is having difficulty concentrating. Annerose-sama is concerned as well, and in this circumstance, she is considering allowing her return to Ryuzu-sama.”

Subaru: “…I understand. I’ll discuss it with Emilia and Roswaal. What are your thoughts?”

Ram: “There is no need to be so forward with my opinion. By all means, do as you please.”

Politely bowing her head, she refused to give her thoughts when prompted. In the past, Ram would have offered her opinion even without Subaru asking for it. However, now she was well aware of her position.

Once again, the eerie sensation of dealing with someone who seemed like a completely different person surged within Subaru’s heart.

Considering Frederica, this was yet another terribly depressing event for Subaru.

While the elimination of Clind was inevitable, the fact that Frederica was present at the ceremony was another cruel twist of fate. Of course, Subaru, out of consideration for Frederica, had tried to keep her away from the venue and as he attempted to deal with Clind.

However, without Frederica's presence, it was impossible to reduce the damage, apart from that done to Clind, to zero. Quite literally, Frederica was Clind's Achilles' heel.

Therefore, no choice remained but to utilize Frederica's presence to strike at that weak point.

As a result, Frederica had suffered deep, emotional scars from which she had yet to recover.

Ram: "…"

Quiet, pale light-crimson eyes stared intently at the silent Subaru.

Under that piercing gaze, he felt as though he was being accused. In fact, being accused outright might have been much better.

He even wished for Ram to call him "Barusu" in her cold tone and for her to insult him again.

But, he could not ask that. Even if he were to command her to call him that, it would be meaningless.

Subaru: "…I'll think about it carefully."

Ram: "Yes, understood. Please, take care."

Once again, Ram bowed to Subaru after relaying her message, and this time, she left the room. As the sound of the closing door echoed, Subaru's shoulders slumped, and he let out a long sigh.

It had been suffocating. Honestly, so long as he kept his guard up, he felt suffocated no matter where he was, but it was especially stifling when he was with Ram.

Escaping that smothering feeling, Subaru turned his attention back to the bed. Finally, the only two left in the room were Subaru and Rem, who continued to sleep.

Subaru: “…Rem.”

Rem: “…”

Lying on the bed, the girl, who simply breathed over and over again in a manner which could not be called mere sleep, replied not. The slight rise and fall of her chest, and the warmth of the blood in her body, were the only signs of life within Rem.

Visiting this place, making sure to take her hand, to check for a weak pulse; that was all that Subaru could do for Rem. It was the only comfort Subaru allowed himself.

Subaru: “…Echidna.”

Echidna: “—For you to call out to me here, is truly a rarity.”

As he sat by her bedside, gently holding Rem’s hand, Echidna replied to Subaru’s call.

The Witch, the one he knew all too well to speak without being called upon, silently waited for a response from Subaru, who was submerged in the lukewarm water of his emotions.

Gradually, the silence continued; it lasted for a dozen seconds, or perhaps a few minutes.

Subaru: “The way to wake Rem… it hasn’t changed, has it?”

Echidna: “Oh, there are no new discoveries. The only way would be to reclaim her from the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, the one who put her in this sleep… but, that is not realistic, considering the likelihood of encountering the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony. Even if you were to hypothetically use your beloved as bait—”

Subaru: “Echidna.”

Echidna: “My apologies, that was only a joke. Anyway, the Sin Archbishop is in hiding, not showing themselves. If you could make contact with them, I am sure there would be numerous ways of making them talk utilizing your Authority."

Subaru: "That's right. Of course, that's right. If I can manage to find them, catch them, and force them to tell me how to reawaken Rem, I can challenge them tens of thousands of times. Even so…"

They were nowhere to be found. The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, that despicable blasphemer, never revealed themselves.

Even during the unprecedented catastrophe that had struck the Watergate City of Priestella, the scene of the horrific terrorist attack perpetuated by the Witch Cult, Gluttony did not appear.

—Why, why, why, why, why: that question filled his mind.

Subaru: "No matter what I do, I can't find that damn Gluttony. That's why…"

Echidna: "—That is why, you have no choice but to obtain the Dragon's Blood."

Subaru's denied wish was met with a glimmer of hope offered by the Witch.

Subaru shifted his bloodshot eyes and stared at the Magic Crystal hanging at his chest. Although he was unable to see the Witch of Greed, she must have been able to see Subaru.

The image of a challenger marching along an infinite path, clinging to the slimmest of hopes.

Subaru: "—With the Dragon's Blood, I can wake up Rem."

Echidna: "I refer to the Divine Dragon. Using the omnipotent power contained in the blood of its heart, I believe you should be able to release the girl's soul from her sleep."

Echidna's words were naught but speculation. But, it was a convincing speculation.

Though she had spoken without making explicit statements, the words of the Witch resounded forcefully. Thus, for now, Subaru believed that this was the way to save Rem.

The Dragon's Blood was considered to be one of the treasures which the Divine Dragon Volcanica had bestowed unto the Kingdom of Lugunica.

It brought plentiful harvest to the lands, kept away every disease, and had the possibility of granting miracles.

It could only be used by people with the highest pedigrees of social status within the Kingdom.

In other words, it was those who—

Subaru: "If you ascend to the throne, you can get your hands on it."

Echidna: "Of course. —It is for that reason that you must make her, your beloved, King."

Subaru: "…"

Echidna: "Back your beloved, support her, and make her King whilst you save those whom you wish to save. And only when you obtain the Dragon's Blood, will you be able to save Rem."

The words of Echidna seeped into Subaru's mind like a poison.

In order to save Rem, Emilia needed to become King. Making Emilia King, and fulfilling Emilia's wishes, were among the goals that Subaru aimed to achieve.

It was of utmost importance. Supporting Emilia would result in saving Rem.

Make Emilia King, to save Rem.

In the end, Rem would be saved thanks to Subaru's desire to make Emilia King.

Therefore—

Echidna: “Therefore…”

Subaru: “Stop it, you dumbass… Don’t try and shake my determination like that every time you can. Why are you trying to lower my opinion of Emilia like that?”

Echidna: “That was not my intention though?”

Subaru: “You’re not very convincing. We’ve repeated this conversation many times, dozens of times, hundreds of times.”

As if to brainwash him, the Witch would often pour poison into Subaru’s mind.

To change Subaru’s aims, she attempted to undermine his valuation of Emilia. But, that was a line that Subaru would not cross. If he were to make that mistake, Natsuki Subaru would lose the qualification to trample upon his own corpses that he had sacrificed so far.

Subaru: “You shouldn’t let your selfish feelings get in the way. No matter what you harbor against Emilia.”

Echidna: “That is a misunderstanding. Well, no matter how much I say, your thoughts will never meet mine; we are like parallel lines.”

Subaru: “We’ve had this conversation over and over again, and each time you say that we’re like parallel lines.”

In this partnership with Echidna, there were times like these where he could never let his guard down.

The Witch claimed to be Subaru’s accomplice, and by lending Subaru her wisdom as a contribution, she planned to exploit not only Subaru’s Return by Death, but also Subaru’s very way of being.

Although, thanks to her always being naive in the end, he had managed to avoid those poisonous fangs.

Subaru: “I’ll get my hands on the Dragon’s Blood. By making Emilia King. —But, that’s not something I’m only gonna do to save Rem. Making Emilia King will lead to saving Rem. My original intention remains the same. Make no mistakes there.”

Echidna: “My, my. I would not mind it if you were to dance to my tune occasionally. If you never let down your guard even a bit, I will not be able to save face as a Witch, you know?”

Subaru: “Your execution is too naive. …Or rather, perhaps, you’re too naive at the core. You’re not cut out to be a complete villain. That’s helped me so far.”

Echidna: “I see. I will try to keep that in mind.”

Echidna admitted her defeat with surprising readiness. Even if she attempted to use this as a lesson for next time, she probably would not be able to do so.

The reason for that, was because one’s nature cannot be so easily changed. Because it is not something that can be changed.

Natsuki Subaru would always be Natsuki Subaru, no matter what befell him.

The Witch of Greed, Echidna, would only ever be the Witch of Greed, Echidna.

One has no choice but to live armed with that which cannot be changed.

Because, in life, one can only play with the cards they are dealt.

Subaru: “—Rem, wait for me. For sure, I’m gonna wake you up. That’s why…”

—No matter how many times he would die.

His resolve was not exaggerated, and the stakes were not something to be surrendered lightly.

Regardless of how many times he threw it away, he would continue to spend his inextinguishable life. If that eventually led to her waking up, he would feel no regrets.

Just that much, just that much, just that would be good enough.

8

—After his visit to Beatrice’s library and Rem’s bedroom, he had reached the end of his daily routine.

Subaru gave the closed door of the room a light-hearted knock. Then, an immediate knock sounded in return from inside. It was not a reply, but a knock.

In response to that, Subaru gave another knock once again. And then, the other party immediately knocked back; not to be outdone, he knocked again. Not wanting to lose, the other knocked once more. Knock, knock, knock—.

???: “—Jeez, how long are you going to keep that up! It’s making me reaaally~ anxious.”

And, the one to lose their patience first was the one within the room.

The door opened from the inside, and the face of a beautiful girl with amethyst eyes and silver hair could be seen—she was the embodiment of supreme beauty that never ceased to captivate all things in this world.

Such was Emilia: even when she blushed with her cheeks puffed out, she gave off an impression of delicateness rather than of beauty; Subaru could not help but laugh.

Emilia: “Ah, what are you laughing for? Ugh, Subaru, you’re such a twit.”

Subaru: “Who even says twit these days. After all, it was Emilia-tan who started to return the knocks first. I just went with the flow.”

Emilia: “So that’s how you put it. Hmph, that’s fine. If that’s the case, I just won’t let Subaru into my room.”

Emilia tried to close the door, her face etched with annoyance from having heard Subaru speaking through his laughter. Seeing that, Subaru hastily put his hand in the gap of the doorway—

Subaru: “OWWW!”

Emilia: “Ah! Subaru, are you okay?!”

Emilia jumped at Subaru’s over-exaggerated shriek of pain after having had his fingers pinched. Quickly rushing out of the room, she hurriedly grabbed Subaru’s aching right hand, and,

Emilia: “Nom.”

Subaru: “Ehh, Emilia-tan?! Isn’t that a little bold?!”

Emilia: “Mmphphnn, mmhmhhmhpphhnomnomnomnomnom.”

Whatever he tried to say was muffled by Emilia’s angered reaction and her sharp amethyst eyes.

Emilia’s thin lips wrapped themselves around the reddened fingers of Subaru’s right hand. In between her soft lips, he could feel Emilia’s warm, pink tongue gently tracing the numbing pain which afflicted Subaru’s fingers.

Tingling with that sensation, a sensual shiver traveled up Subaru’s spine.

Emilia: “Mhm… that should do, I think. Subaru, that must’ve hurt… hey, why is your face bright red?”

Subaru: “I can’t help my boyish reaction, given how confused I was by that unexpected development… uhh, well, I’m okay. Thank you very much. That should do it for me.”

Emilia: “—? I’m not sure if I understood that, so I’m going to use healing magic, okay?”

Emilia gave a bewildered face as Subaru bowed his head, holding up his fingers which had been licked. However, she immediately switched her attention, and began to heal Subaru’s fingers with a light blue surge of magic.

The healing magic completely cured the pain that had been soothed by Emilia's tongue. All that remained for Subaru was how he would deal with his saliva-drenched fingers.

Subaru: "I'll wipe them on my clothes… wait no, that would be a waste. That being said, would it be too much to just openly lick them…?! But, if I let this opportunity escape…"

Emilia: "Ah, sorry. I got them covered in my spit. Yep, all squeaky clean now."

Subaru: "Dammit! It was a choice with a time limit—?!"

Not even noticing Subaru's astonishment, Emilia wiped his fingers with her handkerchief, looking pleased with herself. Then, suddenly, she glanced at Subaru's neck, and she blinked her eyes rapidly.

Still visible were the untreated scratch marks Beatrice had left. Emilia was quick to notice them, and gently touched the wounds with her white fingers.

Emilia: "Subaru, that looks painful. What happened here?"

Subaru: "Ah, aaaah, this? I just got my neck caught on something on the way here…"

Emilia: "Liar."

Subaru attempted to smooth over the situation, but he was interrupted; Emilia spoke only that one word.

With her round eyes wide open, she stroked Subaru's wounds with her finger over and over again, before eventually muttering a few words.

Emilia: "—It was Beatrice."

The moment she spoke thus, Emilia's voice became emotionless and cold.

In an instant, an enormous amount of pure white force surged from Emilia’s body. It swept through the halls of the mansion in one fell swoop, and Subaru’s skin was caressed by a great burning cold.

The air froze, the chill caused it to crackle, and Subaru raised his voice in a panic.

Subaru: “Emilia! Emilia, calm down! Everything is okay, everything is okay!”

Emilia: “…”

Subaru: “Emilia! Here, look at me!”

Emilia: “—Ah”

He forcibly extended his arms and hugged the girl’s slender body as he called out to her.

Calling Emilia’s name over and over again in her ear, Subaru, who was close enough that she could feel his breath, shouted as he saw himself reflected in those amethyst eyes.

At the sound of his voice, Emilia’s blurry eyes came into focus, and she let out a small whimper.

In an instant, the cold air that was spreading across the mansion’s top floor vanished, and the overwhelming pressure that had been surrounding his body also dissipated, returning things back to as they were before.

Subaru: “Th-That was close. A little more of that, and Reinhard would have come rushing in…”

Emilia: “I… I… n-now… eh…?”

Subaru: “It’s okay, it’s okay. Emilia-tan is a good girl, a good girl, everything is okay.”

Her eyes darting around, Emilia slumped down on the floor, and Subaru crouched down next to her. As she hugged her own body, unable to comprehend what had just transpired, Subaru gently stroked her back.

Gradually, Emilia's breathing regained its composure, and then, timidly looking at Subaru's face,

Emilia: "S-Sorry? I… was acting weird again…"

Subaru: "It's alright. Any troubles caused by Emilia-tan aren't troubles at all. That's the role I want to take on. Don't worry."

Emilia: "…Y-Yeah."

As Subaru spoke to her, Emilia nodded even as she continued to frown.

Subaru would not let go of her body until her heart truly settled down.

Emilia's unstable psyche—it was significantly impacted by the fact that she was unable to surmount the Trails in the Sanctuary

In the end, he would never know what she saw in the first Trial, the Trial which showed glimpses into one's own past.

Nevertheless, whatever memories she saw had broken Emilia's heart into pieces. And then, unable to overcome the Trials with her own strength, Subaru had completed them himself, and the opportunity was lost.

Therefore, Emilia's progress was probably still trapped within the tomb even now.

But, no matter how long she continued to reject, to mourn, time would continue to progress without cease. And neither the world, nor her surroundings, nor anyone would tolerate her stagnation.

For that reason, Subaru would continue to take Emilia by the hand, even when she halted to a stop.

Emilia: "Sorry, Subaru. I'm causing Subaru trouble again…"

Subaru: "It's okay, it's no pro, no problem at all. Rather, it makes me feel welcome."

Emilia: "…Hehe, aww, Subaru. Mhm, thank you. I'm okay, I've calmed down."

After a brief embrace, Emilia lifted her face from Subaru's chest. She stood up quickly, her warmth leaving his body, and Subaru stiffened his lips with a look of regret.

Subaru: "Dammit. I wanted to enjoy Emilia-tan's softness just a little while longer."

Emilia: "Huh, would that be for the best? If Subaru says so, I'll do it."

Subaru: "Nononono, it's fine. This is a trick I use quite often to cope with dissatisfaction. Gorging yourself until you're full is for cattle. I think rather than a pig in its sty, I'm more like a wolf that's chasing after its prey."

Emilia: "That might be true. I also think Subaru is closer to a dog than a pig."

Subaru: "But, isn't it a completely different story when it comes to dogs and pigs?!"

With this absurd exchange, Subaru was relieved to see that Emilia was once again smiling.

Luckily, it appeared that she had forgotten her anger upon seeing his wounds from just moments ago, which was a relief.

Echidna: "I cannot bear to watch this."

Subaru: "Shut up."

Emilia: "—Huh?"

Subaru: "Ah, I wasn't saying that to Emilia-tan. Sorry, I was talking to myself."

Subaru instinctively replied to those suddenly interjected thought waves, startling Emilia.

Through the thought waves coming across the Magic Crystal, the strong sense of disgust towards Emilia who stood before him was evident. Taking advantage of the fact that only Subaru could hear her scorn and mockery, the Witch's abusive behavior was unbearable.

Emilia: "W-Would it be better for me to shut up? If that's what Subaru wants, I will do my best to stay quiet…"

Subaru: "It's not like that! It's fine, so let's talk a lot, okay? It's okay if you talk to me."

Emilia: "…Really?"

Emilia's amethyst eyes began to timidly moisten with tears. When Subaru nodded in response, Emilia let out a sigh of relief, once again taking Subaru's hand,

Emilia: "Well then, tell me, Subaru. —What should I do today?"

Subaru: "…"

Emilia: "Yesterday, I finished studying in my room as you told me to do. If it's something Subaru says, there's no doubt I will do it. So, can you tell me what I should do today?"

—She would do what was said by Subaru; she would make no mistake if it was Subaru; she would believe in Subaru.

In response to Emilia's words, Subaru struggled to keep his fake smile from disappearing from his face.

The smiles he had practiced in front of the mirror: the culmination of these efforts was on display here. Thanks to that, Emilia harbored no distrust or suspicion, but she simply waited with her eyes twinkling in anticipation for Subaru's response.

Emilia, who had been unsuccessful in her attempts to overcome the Trial of the tomb, was trying to protect her heart by completely relying on Subaru. —That was only natural.

By utilizing the power of Return by Death, Subaru had completely eliminated every obstacle that stood before Emilia. Emilia mistakenly believed that it was best not to defy Subaru's words, that his trust in her was something that she could earn; he had gotten this far by doing so.

Emilia's heart clung to Subaru, and he realised that she had become so terribly unstable that no matter how many Deaths he experienced, it was already beyond the point of no return.

There were other things which could not be undone. —For example, the beautiful silver hair of Emilia, who smiled before him, had been cut completely short.

Subaru: "…"

The exact reason as to why was unclear.

However, Emilia had cut her long hair, much to Subaru's surprise. Was it to catch Subaru's attention, or maybe to reduce the time and effort spent on grooming?

Or perhaps, did she do it to look closer to the "Sleeping Beauty" whom Subaru often frequented?

All of these were speculations. He did not know the answer. There was no turning back.

But still, Subaru did not consider this situation to be the worst.

Subaru: "Well then, I have a request for Emilia-tan. Today, just like yesterday, keep up with your studies! If I do something important again, I'll let you know in advance."

Emilia: "Like in Priestella?"

Subaru: "Yeah, just like in Priestella. Until then, you need to keep your spirits up. Preparing for an emergency, and boosting your own morale, those are assuredly the most important things Emilia-tan can do right now."

Emilia: "Mmm, understood, Subaru-sensei. I will do as ordered. So, could you—"

Emilia enthusiastically agreed with Subaru, who had put on somewhat playful theatrics. Emilia had accepted his command with something resembling a salute, then, as her words trailed off at the end,

Emilia: “—So, if I do that properly, could you stroke my head?”

Peeking up at Subaru, Emilia spoke this with anxiety and embarrassment in her eyes.

Subaru gasped at the sight of her, and for a moment he stood stock still. If that moment continued for any longer, it would not be hard to imagine despair creeping into Emilia’s eyes.

But, fortunately, Subaru put on a smile before that could happen,

Subaru: “Isn’t it obvious? Rather, shouldn’t I be the one asking for legal permission to touch Emilia-tan’s hair?”

Emilia: “—? If Subaru wants to touch it, he can touch it any time he wants…”

Subaru: “I’m! Saying!! That also would be a reward, so I shouldn’t. When good things happen, then I promise to do so. I will pet Emilia-tan. OK?”

Emilia: “Mhm, ohh kei.”

Subaru flashed a brilliant smile in confirmation and gave her a thumbs up, to which Emilia nodded awkwardly. And then, reluctantly, still holding Subaru’s hand in hers—

Emilia: “Alright, I’ll go back to my room.”

Subaru: “Aaah, I’ll have Petra bring some food up, so let’s eat together.”

Emilia: “Yes, I’ll be waiting. Well, I’ll see you later, okay?”

Waving her hand, Emilia walked back into her room. —Watching her hair, which had now been cut short, sway sadly, Subaru resisted the urge to let out a long sigh.

Before long, the door closed shut with a sound behind her, and the connection between Subaru and Emilia was physically severed.

Echidna: “Good grief, even ugliness has bounds.”

Subaru: “…”

As soon as Emilia was out of sight, Echidna started her abuse. To those words, smeared in revulsion, Subaru gave no reply.

From the time he had entered into this relationship with Echidna, he had come to learn to never exchange words with her concerning the harsh way she treated Emilia.

If he did not speak, she would not speak.

If Subaru maintained that stubborn attitude, the Witch would perceive it as futility, and would remain silent.

Only regarding Emilia, could Echidna not be relied upon.

And, concerning the relationship between Subaru and Emilia, even though it did not seem to have changed from before, it still was different than it was, but he did not have the time to fix it currently.

Echidna: “It would be more convenient for you if she were but an obedient doll, would it not?”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

His throat choked at her cruel remark, and Subaru regretted his reaction.

They were words that should not have been affirmed, but they were words that could not be denied.

To protect life; to protect the future; to protect hope; to protect possibility.

For this reason, he would sacrifice Emilia’s Present heart.

And, that it would not be limited to Emilia alone, Subaru was well aware of this fact.

9

Everyone would gather together, and share a meal with one another.

That simple rule of the Emilia Camp had over time become meaningless, with hardly anyone adhering to it.

Subaru: “Sorry, Petra. We’ll be having our meal in Emilia’s room.”

Petra, who was in charge of the meals, looked disappointed when Subaru informed her of this. However, she quickly masked her disappointment, and carried Subaru and Emilia’s meal to her room.

For Emilia, who was mentally unstable, there was an ironclad rule that no one else was to accompany her during her meals.

Emilia: “Subaru, here, ahhhh~”

In the same manner that Subaru would spoil Emilia, during their meals, Emilia would indulge Subaru as well. Amidst this interaction, and occasionally supporting Emilia whenever she wavered, the breakfast had come to an end.

Afterwards, as per Subaru’s instructions, Emilia went to her desk, determined to study diligently.

Emilia: “I need to do exactly what Subaru says to become a great King.”

Cheering on that adorable, self-motivated Emilia, Subaru left her room.

Having had some of Roswaal’s official work delegated to her, Emilia’s knowledge for the Royal Selection far surpassed that of the first time he had met her. The fruits of her effort were ripening day by day.

However—

Echidna: “Regardless of what she does, in the end, she will always come to seek your approval. An awfully interesting way to raise a King.”

Subaru: “Shut up.”

Echidna: “You too are harboring unease concerning it. I know you are always wavering about whether she should be allowed to ascend the throne in her current state. However, you have no other choice but to do so.”

Having left Emilia’s room, Echidna’s words dripped poison into Subaru’s ears as he walked down the mansion’s corridors.

It was true that Emilia’s psyche had become unstable, and the willpower she had at the start of the Royal Selection had been greatly shaken. Nevertheless, she would certainly sit upon the Kingdom of Lugunica’s throne.

None other than Natsuki Subaru would make it so.

By Returning by Death repeatedly, he would remove every hardship from before her, every impediment standing in her way, so that Emilia’s ambitions would be fulfilled.

And, by doing so, he would not only support Emilia, but also save Rem.

Supporting Emilia, saving Rem, keeping those dear to him away from harm. —Was this not the exact future that Natsuki Subaru had hoped for when he made the Contract with the Witch?

—I am sorry, Natsuki-san. This is where we must say farewell.

Subaru: “…”

Suddenly, a voice resonated not within his eardrums, but within his own memories, halting Subaru’s steps.

Turning his head around, he saw no one in his surroundings. He thought it perhaps was just the poor humor of the Witch, but it could not have been her thought waves. It was something else entirely: it was a call from his own memories.

The voice continued.

—As for me, Natsuki-san. Even through all of this, I thought of you as my benefactor. I thought of you as a person to whom I owed a great debt, one which I wished to repay any way I could.

The voice continued.

—But, I see your decision, and I understand it. You do not want anyone's help; on the contrary, you try, and somehow accomplish everything on your own.

The voice continued.

—Therefore, this is my way of returning the favor. Since you probably will try to protect everyone close to you, I will take my leave.

The voice continued.

—Well then, goodbye, Natsuki-san. Take care of yourself.

The voice continued.

—I thought of you as my friend.

The voice continued.

—Although, that must not have been the case for you.

Subaru: "—HK!"

Just as the last of these words resounded in his mind, Subaru punched the wall next to him with all of his might. A hard thud resounded throughout the corridor, and Subaru's fist cracked pitifully.

As blood dripped from his knuckles, Subaru exhaled raggedly and put his other hand to his head.

In this moment, he could not forget them, the parting words of Otto

Suwen.

Having saved the Sanctuary and the mansion, having survived a life-threatening commendation ceremony, and having overcome numerous challenges, Otto said those words to Subaru before departing the mansion.

Even though more than a year had passed since then, the vision of him walking away never disappeared.

It seemed as if he had condemned Subaru for choosing to save everyone.

Echidna: “But, you made no attempt to stop him. In actuality, the fact that there are fewer people for you to protect has only been a blessing for you.”

Subaru: “You’re wrong. It’s not like I didn’t stop him for such calculating reasons. It’s just, that I respected his wishes. From the start, he was a guy who had no reason to stay here.”

He was attempting to repay him for purchasing his cargo and rescuing him from the Witch Cult.

But, when it came to reimbursement, the debt was settled the moment he had driven the dragon carriage to save Emilia, who was about to be blown away by a time bomb.

And as for the cargo, once the proper payment had been exchanged, this debt, also, was no longer owed.

For Otto Suwen, there was no reason to cooperate with the Emilia Camp.

If he were to continue staying there without such a motive, he would need a reason that went above and beyond what led to him leaving to continue his life as a travelling merchant, something that could only exist for him within this place.

Therefore, he did not stop him when he decided to leave. Besides, even though Otto’s Divine Protection of the Soul of Language was useful, it was not indispensable for winning the Royal Selection.

In the first place, if he continued to be associated with the Emilia Camp, he would still be in danger from both the Witch Cult and the Royal Selection. It was better for Otto to leave this place

He had not heard any rumors of him since then. Their relationship was shallow to begin with; it was of no consequence.

Natsuki Subaru had others he had to protect by sacrificing his life.

Subaru: "…"

Stepping on the dripping blood, Subaru shook his head and started to walk away.

Recently, his thoughts were violated in this way by things that were out of his control. It was frustrating. It was irritating. And above all, Echidna seemed to be enjoying it.

There were countless things to consider. He had no time to brood within his own mind.

He needed to choose the best, the very best, the greatest, the ideal, the optimum choice.

And despite that—

Subaru: "…"

Stepping quickly through the corridor, Subaru returned to his room. He could not allow anyone, even inadvertently, to see his face right now.

Natsuki Subaru is calm, Natsuki Subaru is rational, Natsuki Subaru is optimistic; there is nothing different about him than usual.

So that things could remain as they were, everyone in the mansion must believe such things.

Otherwise, he would not be able to protect those he wished to protect—.

???: "—Oh my, you seem to have returned in a hurry."

He entered the room, and as soon as he locked the door behind him, Subaru's head shot up in shock.

Seeing Subaru's excessive reaction, the figure sitting on his bed smiling sweetly, gently stroking her hand across her long, braided hair.

???: "I thought I'd arrived on time, but you glaring at me like that is quite troubling."

Subaru: "—Elsa."

Elsa: "Yes, that's correct. The Bowel Hunter, Elsa Granhiert, at her master's request has come as quickly as she could—I'm not bothering you, am I?"

Articulating so, tilting her head seductively was a beautiful woman dressed in a rather revealing black garment that exposed her feminine body—an assassin with a bewitching yet poisonous aura, Elsa.

After his initial surprise, Subaru readily accepted the presence of the woman who had entered his bedroom without warning. There was no reason for him to panic.

After all, she was not his enemy. She had been once before, but that was all in the past now.

Subaru: "Now, I'm your collaborator… that is, unless you're holding a grudge over the fact that I fed you to the Rabbit."

Elsa: "That was an unforgettable experience. Besides, you rescued me before I was digested as Rabbit food. So, I'm not holding any grudges against you for that."

Echidna: ""For that": that is quite the loaded statement."

As she sat on the bed, Elsa's black eyes shimmered bewitchingly. Subaru tensed under her unfathomable gaze, yet Echidna's tone remained unchanged as she whispered.

Echidna's observation was not a nitpick, but rather an accurate assessment.

In order to repel Elsa's attack on the mansion, Subaru had lured the Great Rabbit and had used it to overwhelm her with sheer numbers. Afterward, he had saved her from the brink of death, making her indebted to him.

However, he did not believe that this alone was enough to control this dangerous individual.

Subaru: "That's why Meili remains a hostage. My loyal subordinates are keeping an eye on her."

Elsa: "…I know that without you needing to remind me. To be honest, I'm quite angry about it, but I have no complaints about the job itself. I also have no objections to you being my employer."

Touching the hilt of her kukri knife at her waist, Elsa licked her lips with her red tongue.

Contrary to her words, the pressure she exuded was capable of slicing Subaru's neck at any moment. —The only thing holding her back was the presence of Elsa's sister, Meili, who was currently held captive.

She was in a separate location from the mansion, where the duplicates of Ryuzu—Pico and the others, were taking turns keeping watch. She was not being treated poorly.

Subaru: "It'd be far too risky for me now to let you go."

Elsa: "Even with the Sword Saint at your disposal, it seems I've been valued quite highly."

Subaru: "Somebody's gotta do the dirty work, don't they?"

As Subaru responded in a lowered voice, Elsa placed her hand over her mouth and chuckled.

Currently, Elsa was secretly cooperating with the Emilia Camp, working behind the scenes.

—The leader of the camp, a symbol of purity who could not be tainted: Emilia.

—Lauded as the Sword Saint, with an unwavering reputation: Reinhard.

—And, averting numerous challenges with zero casualties, and overcoming many obstacles: Natsuki Subaru.

As a result of these accumulated reputations, Elsa had been asked to do the dirty work on behalf of Subaru and the others who were unable to do it freely. Of course, even though it was referred to as dirty work, the tasks assigned to her were not sinister activities such as assassinations or political purges.

She simply was proactively eliminating any potential obstacles or dangers that might come their way.

She had been entrusted with other tasks as well. Today's report concerned one of them.

Subaru: "So, how did it go?"

Elsa: "Sorry to report, but Gluttony was nowhere to be seen at the location you sent me to. There was nothing there but a motley crew of Witch Cultists… I helped myself to every last one of them. "

Subaru: "Aah. You're free to do whatever you want with that. … But, in the end, it was a dud?"

Subaru frowned and sighed at the report that had come from Elsa, who licked her blood-red lips.

Once again, it was a miss. Subaru's arrow had missed its target, and the target had gotten away again.

In search of the whereabouts of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, he had set up an information network in various locations, hunting down every Witch Cultist from one end to the other; yet, Gluttony was nowhere to be found.

Subaru: "In the end, the only one we've killed is Greed."

Elsa: “That, and Wrath was captured. I think that was a success, but I guess it might not be for you.”

Subaru: “…Anyway, I got your report. For now, remain on standby until I need you again. If there’s anything I need to ask of you, I’ll contact you again.”

Elsa: “Yes. Understood. By the way, I’d like to meet with Meili…”

Subaru: “—You can’t. But, I won’t hold her captive forever. At most, you’ll need to be patient until the Royal Selection is settled.”

Rejecting Elsa’s request, Subaru emphasized the duration of their agreement. In response, Elsa replied with a brief “Yes, I understand”, and headed straight for the window rather than the door.

Since Subaru’s room was on the third floor of the mansion, she had probably entered through that window. It was not surprising that she managed to pull off such a feat of acrobatics—

Subaru: “Ah, wait, Elsa. There’s one more thing I want you to ask you.”

Elsa: “—? What may that be? I don’t really know anything of much importance.”

Subaru: “It’s nothing that important. Since you came from outside… how was the weather beyond the forest? Was it raining or anything?”

Elsa: “The weather? Ah, there was no problem with it whatsoever. The clouds are a bit thick, but there’s no need to worry about it getting worse. Is that all?”

Subaru: “No…”

Twisting his head to the side, Subaru gazed at the Magic Time Crystal in his room. Right now, it was already Fire Time—it had gone past seven Bright Time, and was now just after lunchtime.

After confirming this, Subaru walked over to Elsa, her feet still planted on the windowsill,

Subaru: “I want to ask you to do something. —Please, cut off my head with that knife.”

Elsa: “—Your head… I wonder, have you lost it already?”

Subaru: “I’m being completely sane, okay? I’m just asking you to do something that has to be done.”

Curiously widening her eyes at Subaru’s remarks, Elsa emanated a fierce aura. But, Subaru’s attitude remained unflinching.

Seeing his imposing manner, Elsa shrugged her shoulders.

Elsa: “Generally speaking, most people who have their heads cut off usually die.”

Subaru: “I suppose I also fall under that category. I’m not sure about you, though.”

Elsa: “I think I too would die if my head were to come off… Are you sure about this?”

Subaru: “Don’t worry, this won’t cause any harm to Meili. I’ll have someone bring you written instructions later so you’ll know where Meili is. Is that okay?”

As Subaru assuaged her concerns with his reassuring words, Elsa contemplated for a moment. However, after only a few seconds of thought, she slowly unsheathed her weapon—

Elsa: “Do you have any last words?”

Subaru: “Make it painless.”

Elsa: “…”

Subaru: “Ah. I told you about Meili, but you can do whatever you want with my guts after I’m dead. Just don’t lay a finger on anyone in the mansion. Well, I guess that’s why I have Reinhard arou—”

Before he could finish saying those words, Elsa’s arm sliced through the air.

For just a moment, Subaru’s field of vision was turned upside down. As his view of the room spun around, he watched as blood splattered all over that familiar room, and,

—Ah, cleaning this room is going to be hard on Petra.

And, with that thought, Subaru’s life blinked out.

10

—When he woke up from his hollow dreams, Subaru always experienced a suffocating sensation.

However, this time, his release from there was much quicker.

Perhaps, it was because Natsuki Subaru was being reconstructed in a manner different from him waking from sleep.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru jerked up violently, placing his hand against his sweat-drenched forehead. It was cooler than the perspiration typical of sleep, closer to the cold sweat that flowed when faced with the shock of losing his life.

In any case, Subaru’s body was atop the sofa in his own room, and sunlight was streaming in through the window.

Subaru: “…Morning, huh?”

Touching his neck which should have been cut, Subaru rose slowly. Cocking his head, making sure that his head had not fallen to the floor inadvertently, he checked the time using the Magical Time Crystal above his door.

The Crystal was glowing a pale green, indicating that it was currently early morning.

Then, the question that remained was “which” morning it was—.

Subaru: “…”

To confirm this, Subaru quickly pulled out the Magic Crystal around his neck.

As he clutched the ticket that connected this dream world with reality, the tapping of this foot, as if he were in a rush, overlapped with hot pulses, and Subaru’s consciousness was engulfed by a white light.

Subaru: “…”

When he opened his eyes, Subaru was once again standing in the middle of the vast grassy plain.

Turning around, he saw a hill, and under a parasol atop that hill, a Witch clad in black faced a white table, gracefully sipping from her cup.

Ascending the hill, he headed towards the Witch.

Subaru: “Hey, what day…”

Echidna: “…”

Placing his hands on the table, he snarled at the Witch who continued her elegant tea-time. However, she replied not, and simply pointed silently at the seat across from her.

The seat was empty, and a cup of tea had been prepared for a visitor. What she had presented to Subaru was the minimum requirement for participating in her tea party—.

Subaru: “Damn it, I guess I should just drink it, I’ll drink it!”

Grabbing the cup whilst clicking his tongue, Subaru gulped down all of the cup’s contents in one swig. Instantly, the heat of the freshly brewed tea burned his throat.

Subaru: “Ghhhuaa—?!”

Echidna: “Whoaa?! Just a second, just a second! You do know that there was really no need for that?”

Subaru: “Shut up! You play the part of a difficult to please Witch, and this only happened because you insist on making me follow such complicated procedures… ghha, ghhk gh!”

As Subaru choked on the tea he had swallowed, even Echidna hurriedly stood up from her seat. She then placed her hand on Subaru’s back, and continued to rub his back until his coughing subsided.

Then, after a moment of Subaru’s sputtering,

Subaru: “Ghha, ack… ah, I’ve calmed down… eh, what about the tea?”

Echidna: “Ah, it is fine this time. Also, there is no fun in having you spit out the tea that I worked so hard to brew. And, the table too, it would be a pity to leave it stained like this.”

Echidna shook her head as Subaru, wiping his mouth, tried to correct his transgression.

Then, with a snap of her fingers, the table that was sullied with the tea Subaru had spit out dissipated, quickly transforming the scene under the parasol into a desolate landscape.

Echidna: “Come now, you even dirtied the chair a bit. Making me stand here to talk to you, what a very sinful man you are.”

Subaru: “I was just choking on my tea and spat out. —Compared to that, we have more important things to discuss.”

Cutting off the teasing words of Echidna, Subaru raised his finger.

That which he had to confirm, was only one thing.

Subaru: “What day is it today? What’s the month and date?”

Echidna: “—Hmm. From that question, I assume you have returned again?”

Subaru: “Yeah. Yes, that’s right. I just want to be sure of the date. What is it?”

While holding out his Magic Crystal, Subaru asked this of Echidna, who fully understood the situation. Receiving the Magic Crystal, Echidna nodded before beginning to share in his Memories.

Echidna: “The month is Kisdam, the date is the fourteenth.”

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “Judging by your expression, it would appear you are half excited and half bewildered.”

Upon seeing Subaru’s reaction, Echidna closed one eye curiously. Subaru nodded with a “Yeah” at her question, his eyes half excited and half bewildered.

Returning to the morning of the day he had Returned by Death was something he had desired. However, it also hinted at the possibility of other anxieties—

Echidna: “Myon myon myon myon myon…”

Pressing the proffered Magic Crystal against her forehead, Echidna began her goofy inheritance of Memories.

While witnessing this Witch’s ritual, Subaru righted the chair he had overturned, and sat down heavily.

He had some concerns. However, being able to return to this very morning was fortunate. Since the events that had transpired were still fresh in his memory, it would not have been too difficult to positively correct the situation.

Subaru: “There shouldn’t be a problem with Petra, but during morning practice I told Reinhard and Garfiel some unnecessary things. I’ll be more careful with that. Also, if I get scratched by Beatrice, it’ll upset Emilia. But, Beatrice hasn’t spoken to me in a while, so…”

He wanted to visit the Forbidden Library and exchange words with

Beatrice as much as possible.

Even if that exchange would be a painful rejection of Subaru in a sorrowful, tearful voice.

Subaru: “Roswaal is the same as usual, and Ram too… ah, she’s going to bring up Frederica in regards to Annerose’s letter, so I gotta come up with a clever response. Also, with Emilia—”

He had to tread carefully, as Emilia could easily go out of control if she saw Subaru’s wounds. However, if he were to deal with the situation in Beatrice’s room from before, Emilia would no longer go berserk.

Yet, he did not want to miss the opportunity to talk to Beatrice. Even if he got scratched, would Emilia remain calm so long as he hid his wounds?

Subaru: “Emilia, Emilia, Emilia…”

Were there any oversights, any mistakes, any irreversible problems?

Reflecting on his half of a day, recalling, recalling, recalling—

Echidna: “—Natsuki Subaru.”

As Subaru began to overheat in thought, without him noticing, Echidna, standing by his side, touched his cheek.

It appeared that the inheritance of Memories had completed. Echidna gently placed the Magic Crystal back around Subaru’s neck as his eyes widened,

Echidna: “If there is anything you wish to talk about, I shall listen to anything.”

And, that was all she said.

Subaru: “…”

Hearing those words, Subaru took a short breath and squeezed his eyes tightly shut.

In that quietness, he could feel his feverish thoughts start to calm down. He was okay now; he was fine. It was true that he was so distressed that he felt as if his heart might crack and shatter.

Subaru: “I can handle this much on my own… Thank you.”

Echidna: “—. How surprising. For you to thank me so honestly, you must have been feeling very weak-hearted.”

Raising her eyebrow, Echidna’s words caught Subaru off guard.

He wanted to correct letting those words of gratitude reflexively slip out as some kind of mistake, but the spontaneity made it seem all the more genuine, making it impossible to remedy.

This sensation was something that Subaru had feared. It was something he did not want to put into words.

—He felt more at ease in the dream world with Echidna, than he did in reality where Emilia and his friends were awaiting him.

But such a thing should absolutely not be allowed to happen.

Subaru: “…”

Echidna: “Well, that is fine. Just seeing that expression on your face is enough of a reward for me.”

Gazing at Subaru, who was silently attempting to cover things up, Echidna said this with a teasing tone.

It was extremely uncomfortable, as if she could see right through him, but the more Subaru pursued the matter, the more disadvantageous it would be for him. So, Subaru did not press the issue any further.

More importantly—

Subaru: “If you’ve inherited my Memories, then you should understand. The save point has moved. That means…”

Echidna: “—Another problem that threatens your life is fast approaching.”

Echidna was quick to grasp the situation, and Subaru nodded with a tense expression.

The checkpoint for Return by Death always updated when Subaru was in danger. If Return by Death had reset him to this morning, then a life-threatening situation would arise shortly.

Once again, if Death were to befall Natsuki Subaru—

Subaru: “I’m going to have to borrow your strength again.”

Echidna: “Well, that is what our Contract is all about… Nevertheless, there is just one thing…”

Subaru: “What is it?”

Catching on to her hesitant words, Subaru prompted Echidna to continue. Then, while Echidna twirled her fingers in her long, white hair,

Echidna: “Perhaps I am mistaken, but… you seem to be having a little bit of fun, are you not?”

Subaru: “—. Don’t say such stupid things.”

Subaru snorted in response to her outrageously ridiculous statement.

It was ridiculous, a truly ridiculous thing to say. There was no way something so stupid could be true.

To think that he would find more comfort with the spiral of Death engulfing him, repeating trial and error to escape from it, than he would in peaceful and ordinary days spent with Emilia and his friends.

Subaru: “At best, I’ll be counting on you, Witch of Greed.”

Echidna: “And you, for the sake of satisfying my boundless curiosity, please do your best.”

Ignoring the budding turmoil in his heart, Subaru was ready to take on Echidna and the challenge ahead.

Perhaps it could be said that he had an opportunity for a preemptive strike due to the unexpected update of Return by Death's checkpoint.

Subaru: “If I were to use Return by Death to make the first strike, could it be useful for a surprise attack?”

Echidna: “It is a rather rare opportunity. I certainly hope to make good use of it. —Oh, and…”

Subaru: “Yeah?”

Calling out to Subaru as he was about to go off to battle, Echidna pointed to the Magic Crystal hanging around his neck.

Echidna: “Even after reading your memories, I still cannot understand: why did you Return by Death?”

Subaru: “Ah, that. That was because—”

The answer was—

11

Passing through the door of the dream world, Natsuki Subaru's consciousness returned to reality.

Subaru: “…”

Looking above the door of his room, the time shown by the Magical Time Crystal remained the same as it was before. As usual, feeling uncomfortable about the difference between the time he had perceived and time in reality, Subaru headed towards the bathroom.

He washed his face, brushed his teeth, practiced smiling, and quickly changed his clothes.

And, just as he had finished—

???: “Subaru-sama, are you awake—wah?”

Subaru: “Hey, good morning, Petra. You’re looking cute this morning, too.”

The door opened abruptly, and Petra stood there on the other side, her eyes wide open. But, after quickly realizing that Subaru was just teasing her, she smiled shyly.

Petra: “Jeez, please don’t surprise me like that.”

Subaru: “I’m sorry, I’m sorry. Well, Petra. Aren’t you going to greet me?”

Petra: “Really, you don’t regret what you did even a little? Hmph… yes, good morning, Subaru-sama. Today is once again a splendid morning, you know.”

Without mentioning Subaru’s frivolous attitude, Petra continued with a lovely smile. Her words were exactly the same as that morning before he had Returned by Death.

That being so, the next thing she would say would be exactly the same.

Subaru: “I agree, it’s indeed a splendid morning. Petra is cute today, too; I don’t even need to say it.”

Petra: “Subaru-sama’s still saying such things.… Ah, but there are clouds hanging over the sky beyond the forest, and it seems that the weather may get worse this afternoon. I have plans to go shopping this afternoon, so I hope it’ll stay sunnyyy.”

He listened to the girl talk about what she wanted to do, speaking in a manner which befitted her age; Subaru let out a laugh. Seeing this, Petra puffed out her cheeks, but he hastily replied with a “I’m sorry, I’m sorry” and continued to speak—

Subaru: “But, rest assured, Petra. Today will stay sunny all day. The clouds are giving off a false impression and won’t be a problem. I can say that confidently.”

Petra: “Huh? Really? That’s super helpful… But, how do you know that?”

Subaru: “Well, that’s because…”

Petra inclined her head and widened her eyes at Subaru’s assertion.

Giving her a smile that showed his teeth, Subaru answered the girl’s query.

Subaru: “—Because I returned just for this, putting my life on the line for it.”

12

—A plain of green, a small hill, a white-haired Witch in a mournful black dress sitting at a white table under a parasol, gracefully tilting her cup.

Echidna: “Using one’s own life, to save, to protect, to prevent others from being hurt. How great a feat it is to do so not just once, or twice, but repeatedly.”

Letting out an exhilarated sigh, the Witch recalled the image of a boy with whom she was Contracted.

Desperately pursuing his ideals, pressing onward despite being struck endlessly by reality, possessing the most wretched Authority of Return by Death as his own, a lovable human who continued to fight with all of his might.

Echidna: “—But that Authority is a double-edged sword. Too little regard for one’s own life, and one becomes too fixated on the value of lives other than their own. Sacrificing one’s own life, desperately trying to protect the lives of those precious to them… over time, they cannot focus on anything “except” for the lives of those loved ones. That is…”

No matter when, no matter where, that singular attitude of clinging onto one thing was downright foolish.

And, to be foolish, to be ignorant, to be knowable.

Echidna: “—You truly are, someone desirable to me.”

Cheeks reddening like a maiden in the throes of infatuation, the Witch longed for the absent boy.

Through the Magic Crystal connected to his Gate, she felt the boy’s world as if it were her own.

Was he aware of his own dependence on the Witch? He was willing to Return by Death simply to check the weather, unaware of such a mentality.

Echidna: “But, please rest assured. The lives of those whom you treasure, I will wholeheartedly protect them. I will support you with all of my wisdom. So, for this reason, you too—”

—To satisfy this Witch’s inexhaustible curiosity, I want you to continue being my accomplice.

Times of hardship and unreasonable fate would continue to befall this boy endlessly.

No matter how arduous the hardships, how insurmountable the heights, the boy and the Witch would overcome, lending one other strength and wisdom, hand in hand.

Offered by the Witch of Greed was that love of scorching flame.

Echidna: “Ah, even so—”

Feeling the pain in the hearts of the people the boy scrambled to protect, pain that resulted from being protected by that boy, through the boy’s Gate, the Witch sighed.

A proposition that would remain sempiternally unsolved, even in death; an enigma that would eternally enthrall her.

Ah, even so—

Echidna: “—Why must love fade?”

END

Afterword

Yes, this is the afterword of the bonus novel which comes as a bonus for purchasing the full-volume Blu-ray set!

First of all, thank you for accompanying me up to this point! It’s me, Tappei Nagatsuki, also known as the grey-colored cat!

The story this time, as those familiar with the web version may already know, is the novelized version of the popular “April IF”.

On the first of April each year, on Natsuki Subaru’s birthday, an extra chapter which diverges from the main storyline is published. These IF stories are ambitious works that depict a Subaru who makes choices which diverge from the main story, along with the changes in the characters around him and how the conclusion of the story differs.

This installment, “Accreting in Another World from Zero” branches off from the fourth arc of the main story; in volume 12 of the novel, or episode 37 of the anime, Echidna offers him a Contract, and this is the pattern in which he does not refuse it.

Upon learning about Return by Death, Echidna may seem to be the perfect partner for Subaru, as a woman of wisdom in whom he can confide; however, as those of you who have read the story will know, the number of Deaths which Subaru accretes exceeds a hundred times that of the main story.

The reason behind this is the verbally manipulative Echidna, who steers Subaru into accreting numerous different experiences with deceitful words.

Yet, it is not out of malice, but rather her simply using any means necessary to satiate her own thirst for knowledge. In truth, she even helps by thinking of proper ways to overcome obstacles, leaving Subaru unaware of her underlying intentions.

However, the Subaru in Kasaneru, in his desperation to save the lives of those dear to him, ends up neglecting everything except for those “lives”, and as a result, how does the future he obtains compare to that of the main story?

Does taking the Witch’s hand truly lead him to a happy future? That, I shall leave up to you, the reader, to decide.

Now then, thank you for staying through to the end of this full-volume Blu-ray set purchase bonus novel. Re:Zero — Starting Life in Another World is, I believe, able to continue living on as a truly fortunate work thanks to all of your support.

I hope you’ll continue to stay with us and witness the story of the Re:Zero world as it unfolds. As the original author, I will continue to put everything I have into writing the most compelling story that I can.

Well then, no matter the medium, I look forward to seeing you again soon!

Please, continue to enjoy the story from here on out! Thank you very much!

(Having finished writing the bonus novel for the Blu-ray, with gratitude and a sense of accomplishment.)

Closing Dialogue

Echidna: “Myon myon myon myon myon…”

Subaru: “—. I’ve been thinking about this for a while now.”

Echidna: “Yes? What is it? If something is on your mind, feel free to speak. We are in this together, no? Why would you become shy about it now??”

Subaru: “Don’t phrase it in a way that grates my nerves every time… What is this “Myon myon” thing?”

Echidna: “—? Nothing at all, it is merely a ritual for reading your memories from the Magic Crystal.”

Subaru: “Not that, I’m talking about that lackluster chant. Why “Myon myon myon”?”

Echidna: “Oh, that. It would seem that, before I was born, there was a magic user who made quite the name for herself in an era when magic had yet to be systematized.”

Subaru: “Oh, really? Someone like that… are they related to this?”

Echidna: “Yes. The name of that person is Myonmyon.”

Subaru: “Myonmyon!! That was a person’s name!!!!”

Echidna: “So, when those who received her instruction would use magic, they would chant this to remember the words of their master…”

Subaru: “So, you mean that Myonmyon was the master’s name?”

Echidna: “That is how it is. I suppose that mystery has been solved?”

Subaru: “Now that I’ve solved it, I guess it was a mystery I didn’t really need to be bothered with…”

Echidna: “Hey now, you have me explain it to you, and now you say this? What a terrible boy you are.”

Subaru: “And you, who continually accompanies this terrible boy, also have a strange taste.”

Echidna: “Hehe… well, what do you think? Do you regret it?”

Subaru: “Regret what?”

Echidna: “That day, the day in which you took my hand. That is how you have gotten to where you are now.”

Subaru: “—No, I don’t regret it. This, was the best choice I could have made.”

Echidna: “…Huh?”

Subaru: “Don’t be such a pushover, Echidna. You and I are in this together. No matter how many times, how many dozens, how many hundreds of times it takes to redo, I’m taking everyone with me into the future. You’re gonna have to tag along for the ride, too.”

Echidna: “My my, I had nearly forgotten. You have quite the talent for flirting with Witches, no?”

Subaru: “It’s not a good idea to start a rumor mill… Hey, you’re not gonna continue with “Myon myon”?”

Echidna: “That is correct. For the time being, I would rather talk to the you of the present than delve into the you of the past.”

Subaru: “…I see. Do as you please. Wicked Witch.”

Echidna: “Oh, but of course. —I, am quite the Wicked Witch, am I not?”

Virtuousness Before the Theater (LQ AI Translation)

Prologue:
The Day of Preparations

—The Water Plumage Inn was a long-established inn whose special atmosphere had taken shape even in Priestella, one of the Five Great Cities of Lugunica.

With waterways running all through the city and ever-pure water flowing, the “Watergate City” was also known as a scenic sightseeing spot. What further boosted that reputation was its location at the western edge of the Kingdom of Lugunica, with the Tigracy River between it and both the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko and the Kararagi City-States close at hand, bringing about cultural exchange with neighboring countries—a novelty seldom seen in the kingdom’s center.

The very look of the Water Plumage Inn traded on that novelty: the buildings employed Kararagi’s unique culture of Wafuu architecture, and the newness of it made anyone stop in their tracks.

Therefore—

Anastasia: “—We’re invitin’ the other Candidates here all at once. Think they’re gonna be real surprised, don’t ya?”

Spreading both arms with the inn’s buildings at her back, Anastasia Hoshin spoke, and Julius Juukulius, chosen as the first one to be surprised, widened his eyes slightly.

Julius opened his golden eyes wide; at that reaction, Anastasia nodded in satisfaction,

Anastasia: “Uh-huh, that face. Just what I was goin’ for.”

Julius: “—My apologies. I had heard of Wafuu architecture, but this is my first time seeing such an imposing structure, and I found myself overwhelmed.”

Anastasia: “Nothin’ to apologize for. Didn’t I tell ya? I picked this inn specially ‘cause I wanted to see that face.”

Placing a hand to her cheek, the lady smiled gracefully, and Julius felt abashed at his master’s words. On the other hand, true to what he had told Anastasia, a sure sense of emotion had welled within his chest.

Although Julius belonged to the Royal Guard and was also one of the kingdom’s Knights, there were, in his own home country, quite a few lands he had never set foot in. Priestella was one such land, but this time, he had been blessed with the chance to visit it like this.

Julius: “Since I am here, I would like to spend my time so as to have no regrets.”

Anastasia: “Oh, so yer in the mood, huh. The usual Julius would be worryin’ ‘bout everyone ‘round him ‘stead of himself, scurryin’ here ‘n there payin’ mind to everythin’.”

Julius: “Naturally, I do not intend to conduct myself self-indulgently. I shall put Anastasia-sama foremost in my considerations… “

Anastasia: “Ya will, but?”

Julius: “Perhaps it is a reaction to serving Anastasia-sama. I had thought self-restraint and steadiness to be virtues, yet it seems there is a self within me that finds only that somewhat unsatisfying.”

At Julius’s reply, the corners of his mouth relaxed, and Anastasia let out a delighted,

Anastasia: “Oh!”

Realizing that her surprise carried joy within it, Julius praised himself that he had managed to give an answer to Anastasia’s liking. Of course, it was not as if he had said something insincere merely to please her. It had been his unvarnished true feelings.

He did not wish to keep the charms of the Watergate City or this

Wafuu-style inn at a distance.

Julius: “I presume this inn will not astonish us only with its exterior, will it?”

Anastasia: “’Course not, ya kiddin’? Hearin’ ya expect that much gets me all fired up too. Y’all’ve gotten real used to our way o’ doin’ things, and our knight’s turned into a real honor student.”

Julius: “Your words are more than I deserve. —I only hope the other Candidates safely agree to honor this invitation.”

He did not wish to make Anastasia uneasy after all the preparations she had made to entertain them, but there was a non-zero chance that those arrangements would come to nothing. Should that happen, even Julius would likely be at a loss for words on how to console her.

As Julius entertained that concern, Anastasia chuckled, “What, what?” and,

Anastasia: “Are ya maybe thinkin’ up how to comfort me if things don’t go well?”

Julius: “—Did it show on my face?”

Anastasia: “Mmm-mm, yer the same handsome fella as always. But, ya know, you ‘n me have known each other a good long while now, so I can kinda tell from yer eyes ‘n the feel of ya. Ya sure are a worrywart.”

Having his inner thoughts hit on the mark, Julius reproached himself as his master tittered.

“Tacit understanding” sounded fine when said out loud, but for a knight to have his unease seen through by his master and even be encouraged by her was a lapse unbefitting a knight. In the first place, if it were truly tacit understanding, it should have been mutual—yet Julius could not gauge Anastasia’s inner feelings.

That she was not so easily seen through was, in itself, part of the reason for his loyalty.

Anastasia: “I’m curious what ya’d say to comfort me, but goin’ by my gut, I reckon ‘bout eighty percent o’ ‘em will take us up on it. I put together all the things they’d want, sent the invites without tryin’ to take advantage of ‘em, either. Only for Emilia-san ‘n her folks, the timing might be bad, though…”

Julius: “There was a meeting pending that gathered the influential figures of the West, was there not.”

Anastasia: “Even so, I ain’t ever lettin’ go o’ the chance to get that kitty Great Spirit back. That’s, like, absolutely absolute to ya too as a fellow Spiritual Arts User, ain’t it?”

Julius: “I cannot expressly declare it “absolute,” but yes. I, too, were my bond with the buds to be severed, would spare no effort to regain it. In all likelihood, anyone with ties to Spirits would make the same decision.”

Anastasia: “Mm. Then just sit back ‘n hold firm.”

At Julius’s firm stamp of approval, chin tucked in, Anastasia set her hands at her waist and nodded with heartening confidence. Then, adding, “And also,” she continued,

Anastasia: “If worst comes to worst and my scheme falls flat, then that’s that. In that case… “

Julius: “In that case?”

Anastasia: “Since we done came all the way out here to Priestella, we’ll just make it a lil’ luxurious company retreat for the Hoshin Company.”

At Anastasia’s forthright laughter, Julius blinked lightly, then, unable to help a smile, nodded with, “It is an excellent idea.”

That decisiveness and the flexibility in her responses—both were qualities ordinary people rarely possessed, and Anastasia Hoshin could display them with aplomb. —That, precisely, had been the first reason Julius had desired her to be the Kingdom of Lugunica’s next monarch.

Now, the reasons he wished to make her monarch were no longer limited to that alone, but freshly, clearly feeling that first sentiment again, Julius lifted his gaze to the sky, savoring a pleasant mood.

Under the same sky were the Royal Candidates he had invited to the Watergate City, and the knights who accompanied them. They were by no means so close as to be careless with one another, and the premise that they were opposing camps would not waver. It would not waver—

Julius: “Reinhard, Ferris, and Subaru. —I am looking forward to the time in this city when we can speak of how you have spent this past year.”

Thus, thinking of those who, though they looked up to different masters, surely held bright prospects for the Kingdom of Lugunica’s future as he did, Julius narrowed his eyes against the dazzle of the sunlight.

Chapter 1:
The Day of Invitation

1

—To be honest, Ferris wanted to send that little visitor who had come calling right back where he'd come from.

Hetaro: "Miss… an— a letter from Anastasia Hoshin-sama. She says she has something she wants to tell you, and asks if we could meet in the Watergate City, Priestella."

Ferris: "In the Watergate City, you say?"

At the visitor's proposal, the lady of the manor, who had received him in the parlor, gracefully tilted her head.

The invitation Hetaro handed over was sealed with sealing wax bearing the Hoshin Company's crest. When slender fingers carefully broke the seal, the letter within contained exactly what had been stated. Peeking in from the side, Ferris pursed thin lips with a "Hmm."

Ferris: "Why nya specifically Priestella? Ferri-chan and the others aren't free, of course, and Anastasia-sama's side wouldn't be either. Isn't that strange, nya?"

Priestella, the Watergate City, lay at the western edge of the Kingdom of Lugunica— a city facing the Tigracy Great River that formed the border with the neighboring Kararagi City-States. And Anastasia's country of origin, as well as the Hoshin Company's base of operations under her lead, was the Kararagi City-States.

Ferris: "Which means, Priestella's practically under the other side's nose! Lurin' us into a place like that— wouldn't anyone assume they're up to no good, nya?"

Hetaro: "Um, Miss… no, I think Anastasia-sama has all sorts of considerations. But she's not so thoughtless as to try something so obviously underhanded…”

Ferris: “Mm-mh! So you’re sayin’ Ferri-chan’s take is airheaded, is that what you mean ~ ?”

Sharpening his gaze with a crisp glare, Ferris fixed the visitor— the cat-person boy Hetaro— with a look. At that look, the already-small shoulders shrank even further, and he drooped with a dejected, “I didn’t mean it like that.”

Just when Ferris thought, “Ah, this is bad,” at the sight of that earnest, pitiable boy—

???: “Ferris, you mustn’t bite so hard at a messenger. Hetaro-sama has only delivered a letter at his master’s behest.”

Chided by that gentle yet firm voice, Ferris shut his mouth with a small “mkyu.”

Casting a quick glance, his long, amber eyes met the other’s. Ferris raised both hands meekly in surrender and promptly admitted his fault.

Ferris: “All right, a-lri-ght! Ferri-chan was in the wrong just now.”

???: “You needn’t apologize to me. To Hetaro-sama, if you please.”

Ferris: “Uu~, sorry, Hetaro-kyun. I was a bit rough. Ferri-chan reflects.”

Hetaro: “I— I’m glad you understood. I also often think the Miss can be too sudden sometimes… er, Anastasia-sama.”

Waving his hands in a fluster, Hetaro then clapped those same hands over his mouth.

At his flustered behavior, a hand went to a smiling mouth with a soft chuckle—

???: “Pray, do not force yourself; you may address her as you usually do. I do not think it discourteous. If anything, I simply find your closeness heartwarming.”

Hetaro: "…Embarrassing as it is, I'll do so, Crusch-sama."

Called by name, the beautiful woman—Crusch Karsten—gave a soft nod with an "Yes."

Ferris's liege, Crusch, was a beauteous lady dubbed the "Valkyrie" for her gallant, noble bearing, and at a young age served as head of a ducal house—one of the kingdom's leading figures. Even that alone gave her more than enough presence, yet just now she bore an even grander title upon her shoulders:

—The Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica's vacant throne's next sovereign, one of the candidates.

Four other Royal Selection candidates shared that same title; each strove day and night to achieve results surpassing the others and seize the position of the next monarch. That was Crusch's current standing, and Ferris, her first knight, was giving his full support.

Ferris: "And at a time like this, an invitation from fellow Royal Candidate Anastasia-sama… Isn't it far more unreasonable not to suspect traps or schemin' or this 'n that? Wouldn't you say so too, Wil-ji?"

Wilhelm: "Hm."

Unable to wedge his words into the gentle air between Crusch and Hetaro, Ferris called over the head of his seated liege to the white-haired old butler standing on the other side. In response, the old butler narrowed his blue eyes and fixed Hetaro with a steady gaze.

That look was sharp enough to make Hetaro flinch and twitch his shoulders—yet,

Wilhelm: "I cannot fathom Anastasia-sama's intellect, but if it is Hetaro-dono, I believe he may be trusted. He was among our allies who stood with us in the battle against the White Whale."

Contrary to the sharpness of his gaze, his conclusion came to rest gently. Hearing that explanation, Crusch gave an acknowledging, "Ah," Crusch: “So it was. Hetaro-sama, too, in the battle with the White Whale.”

Hetaro: “Yes. I, together with my big sis and the captain and everyone in the clan, joined the battle against the White Whale. …I could not, however, take part in the subsequent battle against the Witch Cult.”

Hetaro nodded, his voice weakening the further he went.

The reason was surely not that he regretted his own feebleness for failing to join the battle against “Sloth” of the Witch Cult that followed directly upon the White Whale. What made him shrink back was the tragedy that struck the party as they returned to the royal capital after the White Whale— and its outcome.

Ferris: “…That’s why Ferri-chan didn’t even want to see Hetaro-kyun’s face.”

That mutter reached no one’s ears, spoken only within his mouth. Yet it was undoubted truth from Ferris’s heart, and the reason for thinking so lay in the aforementioned tragedy.

Seeing Hetaro’s face, who had been present there, would force him to remember that time whether he wished it or not. And then he would want to push off responsibility he did not want to and lash out unfairly.

However—

Hetaro: “Even in the battle with the White Whale, I was all tied up giving orders to everyone in the clan, so compared to the big sisters who were doing their best at the front, I really couldn’t do anything…”

Ferris: “—That humility’s misplaced, don’t ya think.”

Ferris interjected thus to Hetaro, whose cat ears drooped as he spoke without confidence— not out of a desire to shift blame or to vent.

As everyone’s eyes gathered on the words that slipped out unthinkingly, Ferris disliked his own impatient temperament, yet—

Ferris: “We won that fight because everyone came together as one, didn’t we, nya. Including the people who disappeared, everyone. No one slacked off, no one was useless, nya. Even that Subaru-kyun, and if not for that, even Wil-ji—”

Wilhelm: “—Ferris, I—”

Ferris: “Let me say it, Wil-ji. Ferri-chan and the others… we accomplished something truly hard, we did. Otherwise, it’d make your fourteen years light, wouldn’t it?”

At Ferris’s words, the old butler—Wilhelm van Astrea—closed his eyes.

No one wished more keenly for the White Whale’s subjugation than Wilhelm, driven by the fierce desire to avenge his wife, the “Sword Saint” Theresia van Astrea, who had lost her life in battle with that witchbeast fourteen years prior.

To accomplish that, the Crusch camp had paid many sacrifices. And Hetaro had been among those who took part and fought at the risk of his life.

Therefore—

Ferris: “No matter what anyone else says, we have to praise ourselves for what we did. Absolutely.”

Hetaro: “—. I’m sorry. I was thoughtless.”

At that strong entreaty from Ferris, Hetaro, his round eyes brimming, scrubbed at his face and then answered with a serious expression.

Even with his features set firm, the boy’s adorableness remained; his wilted cat ears sprang upright with a bounce.

Hetaro: “My big sis often tells me the same thing. “Hetaro never puffs out his chest, so he never looks awesome and that’s Totally No Good!”“

Wilhelm: “I see—Mimi-don would indeed say such a thing. It is, in truth, something to nod along with.”

As expected of siblings, Hetaro’s imitation of Mimi’s face and tone was skillful. Even Wilhelm let his lips soften at the quality of it.

Be that as it may—

Ferris: “Uu~, I’m sorry, nya. Ferri-chan totally said too much. Honestly, I end up hating myself…”

Clutching his head, Ferris reflected on the embarrassment of his own words and deeds.

When it came to Crusch, he lost his composure all too easily, and once he did, his words immediately lost their kindness— his bad habit.

At the sight of Ferris’s deep self-reproach, Hetaro hurriedly waved his hands.

Hetaro: “N-No, what Ferris-san said is right. Compared to my big sis and Tivey, my heart’s weaker, and because of that I… sometimes fail…”

Crusch: “Then, did Ferris’s words help you, if only a little?”

At the sudden question from Crusch, who had not spoken until then, Hetaro’s eyes widened.

With a quiet amber gaze turned upon him, Crusch wore a gentle expression, not pressing for an answer, simply waiting for the boy’s response.

At her manner, Hetaro nodded timidly.

Hetaro: “Yes. From now on, I think I can say, “I was one of the ones who took down the White Whale,” too. No— I’ve been given the feeling that I must say it.”

Crusch: “I am truly glad to hear it. In that case, though it may be presumptuous, may I add one thing of my own?”

Hetaro: “From Crusch-sama? O-Of course.”

Smiling, Crusch raised one finger; Hetaro flustered.

Ferris met Wilhelm’s eyes, but neither had any idea what words Crusch might offer Hetaro.

Drawing all three gazes, Crusch gently placed a hand to her own chest and—

Crusch: “In the name of me, Crusch Karsten, what our house bears toward Hetaro-sama is only a deep feeling of gratitude for your aid in the battle against the White Whale. Therefore, as for the events that befell many people thereafter, myself included, there is no need for you to bear responsibility.”

Hetaro: “—ah.”

Ferris: “…”

At Crusch’s firm words, Hetaro’s round eyes flew open.

Ferris, too—at Crusch’s broaching that tragedy they had avoided as a topic—no less, Crusch herself bringing it up, and the manner in which she did—found his voice catching.

On the return from the battle with the White Whale, the tragedy that befell Crusch’s party when they were attacked by a Sin Archbishop, and the rift with Hetaro, who, though present, directed immediate retreat rather than a counterattack.

Both had averted their eyes; it had become, in a way, an unspoken agreement that not touching it was the right choice. Now Crusch touched it directly; at her words, Hetaro bit his lip and lowered his gaze.

Lowering his head, the boy spoke with a trembling voice—

Hetaro: “Back then, I believed I’d made the best decision… But not standing firm to fight, running— I’ve always thought I deserved to be resented for that.”

Crusch: “Your judgment was correct, Hetaro-sama. I think so as well.”

At Crusch’s added words, Hetaro covered his face with both hands and let out a sob.

Crusch, with a gentle smile, continued to watch over him without urging him to stop his tears — and that made Ferris proud, and at the same time, very, very heartsore.

2

Ferris: “In the end, it feels like we were dancing in Anastasia-sama’s palm, and it leaves me all fuzzy and bothered, nya.”

Crusch: “In her palm, you say?”

Ferris: “…Don’t you think that person already knew about Hetaro-kyun’s guilt? And that only Crusch-sama could lighten it, and that Crusch-sama just might do so— it felt like she was expectin’ that, is what I think.”

Seeing Hetaro, who bowed his head over and over, leave the manor after being told to stop already, and then seeing the dragon carriage off until it was out of sight, Ferris indulged in such a cynical guess.

At first, when Hetaro had been sent as a messenger, Ferris had been angered at Anastasia’s lack of consideration, but now, even that felt like it had been part of her calculations.

However, when this was pointed out, Crusch nodded with a “I see,” and—

Crusch: “If that’s the case, then I’m glad I was able to meet Anastasia-sama’s expectations.”

Ferris: “Mou~, Crusch-sama, sayin’ such goody-goody things! Sayin’ we met her expectations sounds nice, but put badly it means we were used, y’know?”

Crusch: “In that case, there’s no need to put it badly on purpose, is there? Besides—”

Ferris: “Besides, what, nya?”

Crusch: “You, too, Ferris, are glad Hetaro-sama’s worries were lifted, aren’t you? I can feel a breeze like the clearing of a weight in your chest.”

With those words, Crusch lightly poked the tip of his nose with a slender finger; Ferris’s eyes darted, then he made an awkward face.

Though the Divine Protection of Wind Reading would not allow lies or bluffs to pass, even if it could not read a specific person’s thoughts, it could pick up their unadorned emotions; thus Crusch could not be deceived about his joy, anger, sorrow, or delight.

In a sense, she could see through the feelings in Ferris’s chest even more clearly than Ferris himself.

Ferris: “But it’s a huge mistake to think Ferri-chan’s worryin’ about Hetaro-kyun. I mean, he’s a formidable rival for the cute cat-ears slot.”

Crusch: “There’s no need to glare at one another over that. My Ferris could never lose.”

Ferris: “C-Crusch-sama~”

Hands on her hips, Crusch declared it so; Ferris’s eyes grew moist and he threw his arms around her. Facing him head-on, Crusch caught him and gently stroked his back.

The strength of that embrace and the way she stroked him were sensations utterly familiar to Ferris. —Even if something is stolen, there are things that cannot be stolen away; it made Ferris certain of that.

Wilhelm: “—The send-off is complete. Hetaro-dono, too, wore a good face.”

At that moment, Wilhelm returned, having finished seeing the messenger off.

Accustomed as he was to the sight of Ferris and Crusch embracing, he nonetheless turned his eyes to the invitation from Anastasia that remained on the table.

And—

Wilhelm: “You will accept the invitation to the Watergate City. Is that correct?”

Crusch: “Yes. I have no intention of changing the reply. From the outset, we have no other options, do we—if we are to be told newly learned information about “Memory” regarding Gluttony.”

Ferris: “…Truly, she’s someone who only ever presses on our sorest spots, isn’t she.”

Still held to Crusch’s chest, Ferris muttered that resentfully.

An invitation from Anastasia to the Watergate City; the profit their camp would gain by accepting it—that was information on the Witch Cult’s Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.

It was information they absolutely could not afford to miss. Dangling the thing the other side wanted most right before their eyes in such a showy way— that was precisely Anastasia living up to her reputation as a great merchant.

Even if this were a trap, Crusch and the others had no choice but to go.

Crusch: “However, I do not think there is any need to worry about traps. Of course, it may mean incurring a large debt to her, but…”

Ferris: “M—why can you say that so flatly, nya?”

Crusch: “—Because it cannot be said that we are worth the trouble of trapping as we are now, can it.”

At Crusch’s voice, which had dropped in tone, Ferris involuntarily held his breath.

Ever since that tragedy, having fallen to Gluttony’s hand and lost her “Memory,” Crusch’s capability had lacked luster. A year had passed since the Royal Selection began; while many camps had visibly gained momentum, Crusch's was clearly the only one in a slump.

Ferris and Wilhelm alike keenly felt the helplessness that came from their own inadequacy in being unable to fully support Crusch.

Struck silent by that statement of fact, Ferris listened as Crusch continued, "That's why," and—

Crusch: "We should gratefully rely on Anastasia-sama's kindness. And then we should use that information to make such a comeback that she'll regret having lent us anything."

Ferris: "—! Crusch-sama…!"

At Crusch's words, which flipped his sinking mood on its head, Ferris's eyes widened. Looking down at his face, Crusch wore a reliable smile.

Crusch: "Now that it's decided, let's start our preparations at once. If we're to be away from the manor for a while, we must inform my father and the vassal corps. We'll be busy."

Ferris: "Yes, that's right, nya! Yes! Understood, Crusch-sama! I'll go drag Meckart-sama over right away~!"

Swept along by Crusch's vigor, Ferris's spirits rode along with it. Regretfully parting from her embrace, he dashed out of the parlor in a great hurry.

With those same feet, he went to summon Crusch's father, Meckart Karsten— who had ceded both the position of head and his title to his daughter and was virtually retired, only to be brought back to work by the problem concerning Crusch's "Memory."

Of late, Ferris had felt pained at being unable to bring forward-looking reports, but he felt that Crusch's resolve, which had set even his heart to a boil, would bring a good wind to the Karsten Domain as well.

Seeing Ferris's back as he rushed out—

Crusch: “—Wilhelm, do you think my resolve is not mistaken?”

Wilhelm: “I deem it most admirable. I, too, would like to help with all my might, little though it may be.”

Crusch: “…Thank you. I cause you and Ferris both such hardship.”

Nodding quietly to the Sword Demon’s words, Crusch softly touched the invitation on the table. —She told herself that on the other end of accepting this invitation lay a way to change her own imperfect self.

As if to make none other than herself believe it, she hid the trembling of her fingers—.

3

???: “Hey, hey, what kind of joke is this?”

???: “You’ve got some nerve barging in to where we are all by yourself.”

???: “Heh heh heh, and just so you know, we ain’t praisin’ ya. A runt like you is the handiest prey there is.”

Seeing a rough trio surrounding the visiting boy, Old Man Rom, who had been given the role of the camp’s adviser, patted his bald head with slaps.

It had been a little over a year since they made the Astrea domain and manor in the kingdom’s southeast their base, but it was a place that never grew comfortable even with a long stay. Not, mind you, because the live-in twin servants working as caretakers in the manor were incompetent.

Simply put, the cause was a problem not outside Old Man Rom, but inside.

Be that as it may for Old Man Rom’s state of mind, visitors came to the Astrea manor for various reasons. Residents of nearby villages, local notables from neighboring lands, people from organizations allied with the camp by policy—though their affiliations differed, attending to them was also an important job for those connected to the camp.

One could say the aforementioned coarse trio were slighting that important job.

Rom: “Hey now, what are you lot doing. He’s a guest, ain’t he.”

Rachins: “Huh? Whaddaya want, Cromwell, you givin’ us a lecture?”

Rom: “It ain’t anything so grand as a lecture. And don’t call me Cromwell. Call me Rom, or old man, or even damn old fart.”

Creaking the cramped stairs beneath a giant’s frame as he descended to the entrance hall, the sanpaku-eyed youth who turned —Rachins—snapped at him with a severe look and tone.

Following Rachins, the big man and the small man beside him, Gaston and Camberley, also turned this way,

Gaston: “Then, Rom-san, we were just doin’ our job.”

Camberley: “Yeah, that’s right! It’s our job to make sure the master don’t get any trouble, yeah? We’re fulfillin’ that role, ain’t we.”

Rom: “Oh? I didn’t know you lot were so diligent. However—”

Coming up before the blustery trio, he peered over their heads at the guest. What he saw there was a small boy—small in fact, regardless of Old Man Rom’s huge frame.

A demi-human who never grows large, a cat-person boy. He held a big staff and wore an unusual monocle, however—

Rom: “Honestly, it looks to me like you lot are bullying a kid.”

Rachins: “That’s not it! This guy’s from Anastasia Hoshin’s lot!”

Rom: “Anastasia Hoshin… the head of the Hoshin Company, is it.”

Now that it was said, Old Man Rom focused on the white robe the cat-person wore. On the wide cuffs of the boy's robe, the Hoshin Company's trade name was plainly stitched.

In other words, the other party was from Anastasia's camp—

Rachins: "So it's a raid!"

Rom: "Don't be ridiculous! Even if they were gonna mount an attack, their strength is economic warfare with funds as a shield. What idiot would challenge the "Sword Saint" head-on."

Rachins: "…Now that you say it, huh?"

The hot-blooded punks, who had been snorting, looked at one another and grasped the situation.

Letting out a big sigh at that reaction, Old Man Rom turned back to the cat-person boy,

Rom: "My folks did a bad thing. They didn't do nothin' to you, did they?"

???: "Yes, there is no need to worry. But it's good it wasn't my big sis or my big bro who came here."

Rom: "Oh? Why's that?"

???: "Because my big sis's hands fly right away, and my big bro's tears do."

With that clear and distinct answer, Old Man Rom nodded to the boy, "I see, I see."

In truth, Rachins and the others had, one might say, gotten off with their lives—or at least avoided a huge embarrassment. As with the servant sisters at the Astrea manor, they were poor at gauging the other party's capability.

One could tell at a glance that this cat-person boy, too, was someone who could fight properly.

Rom: "So then, who might you be?"

Tivey: “I am called Tivey. As I greeted you, today I have come like this as a messenger from Anastasia Hoshin-sama.”

Rom: “…”

At the words of the boy who bowed his head—Tivey—Old Man Rom narrowed his eyes and looked at the three.

Rachins and Gaston, who seemed to grasp the seriousness of the matter, averted their eyes, but the slow-witted Camberley cocked his head with a question mark floating over it. Of course, he would not do something like punishing only Camberley for meeting his eyes. It had been a uniformly foolish act by all of them.

Therefore, Old Man Rom drew a great breath,

Rom: “Tanglin’ with a messenger from another camp, you great big idiots—!”

And with a voice loud enough to be heard throughout the manor, he bellowed at the three.

4

Felt: “So that big dumb yell was you, huh? I about jumped outta my seat.”

Rom: “Sorry. My blood rushed to my head.”

Felt: “Nah, even hearing it, I figured they pulled somethin’ stupid, so it’s only natural, ain’t it? They’ll be gettin’ a thorough chewing-out from Reinhard and Sensei as punishment, I bet.”

Sitting cross-legged on her chair, Felt waved a hand, cackling.

The messenger who had already visited the manor had accomplished his purpose and was on his way home. They had just finished the explanation about the ruckus before and after that messenger’s visit. As for Old Man Rom, he could not stop reflecting on how he had shown an outsider, Tivey, the camp’s shame.

Felt: “Well, that’s just like them, and just like us. The soil we grew in is what it is. No matter how much sand you dump on top from above, you don't pick up fancy manners so easy."

Rom: "Good grief, you… you ought to show a bit more strictness now and then."

Felt: "You sayin' I'm makin' some boring cozy cliques? For the record, the only one callin' me soft is you, Rom-ji… and Grimm Gramps and Carol Granny."

Rom: "Which means to old folks' eyes, it looks precarious."

Felt: "Then there's no problem, 'cause all the other candidates are young… no, the Council of Wise Men are all a bunch of old geezers. Gettin' poked and prodded by them's gonna tick me off."

With a finger to her narrow chin, Felt fell into thought, and Old Man Rom felt her growth.

Her height, compared to a year ago, seemed to have grown a little, but what he felt more strongly was growth on the inside, not the outside. Not only the knowledge and etiquette she had stockpiled through proper education, but a strength polished and refined while keeping the core of her way of thinking and stance.

Plainly put, one could say she had begun to show the bearing of someone who seeks the throne. —And it was in a sense only natural for that bearing to show.

Felt: "Huh? What, Rom-ji, starin' at my mug—got somethin' to say?"

Rom: "—No. It still doesn't quite sit right with me, names like "Council of Wise Men" flyin' out of your mouth."

Felt: "Hey, it's the same for me, all right? But it can't be helped. Whether it's the back alleys or the kingdom, you can only fight where you're standin' now."

Rom: "And if you're going to fight, know your opponent's face and name."

Felt: “Fights you can’t win and fights you don’t know if you can win—only idiots pick those. ‘Bout time I stopped bein’ an idiot.”

Showing her fang and laughing as she boasted, Felt’s reliability made Old Man Rom click his tongue in amazement.

Truly, a child’s growth is swift. All the more so if one thought of Old Man Rom’s lack of change, an old coot since the day Felt was born—comparison was ridiculous.

In fact, the increasingly remarkable growth of Felt as head of the camp meant she no longer came running to Old Man Rom every time something happened to ask for answers on future choices and policy like before.

One sign of that growth was her reply already given to the messenger.

Felt: “Even so, the Watergate City’s pretty far. If Anastasia-neechan was gonna do it anyway, she coulda picked somewhere closer.”

In the hand with which Felt grumbled, she held the invitation Tivey the messenger had handed her. Its contents were an invitation to Priestella, the Watergate City, asking whether they would participate. And Felt had already replied that she would participate and sent the messenger back.

Rom: “For all that grumblin’, you answered “we’ll go” right away.”

Felt: “‘Cause she said she’s invitin’ the other Duchess and the half-devil lady too, right? I’m curious what kinda talk it’s gonna be, and ‘bout a year since the Royal Selection started makes for a neat milestone, doesn’t it? I owe Anastasia-neechan, and it’s also a time when our hands are free.”

Felt waved the invitation as she answered; pinching that invitation from her hand with his fingers, Old Man Rom peered steadily down at Felt with a “Hm.”

Under that gaze, Felt knit her brows with a “Wh-What.”

Felt: “I really have finished all the stuff I gotta finish, okay? The meeting with the Black Silver Coins in Flanders doesn't have any urgent business, and as for what we owe and are owed with Anastasia-neechan…"

Rom: "I understand, I understand. I've no intention of meddlin' with the timing or the aim. But those ain't the only reasons you decided to go, are they?"

Felt: "…"

Rom: "If Crusch Karsten and Emilia and their camps are coming, you'll be able to hear talk of the White Whale's subjugation. The "Sword Saint," too, would surely like to know the slayer of the prior generation's foe."

When Old Man Rom pointed that out, Felt let out a grunt in her throat, then heaved a big sigh and plopped her cheek into her palm atop her cross-legged knee.

Judging by that dissatisfied face, Old Man Rom had hit the mark.

Rom: "There's nothing odd about you lookin' out for that knight, is there."

Felt: "What I hate is lettin' that bastard catch on. …That bastard'll butt in with all sorts of extra mouthin' off, but he won't say a word about that kinda thing himself."

At Felt's resentful declaration, Old Man Rom closed one eye and gave a wry smile.

Most likely, what let Felt learn about the ties between Reinhard—no, the "Sword Saint" bloodline—and the White Whale was the old couple managing the capital manor with whom they exchanged letters.

As someone who knew both that couple and the "Sword Saint" who died in the battle with the White Whale, and even the "Sword Saint's" husband, Old Man Rom had his own thoughts when the news of the White Whale's subjugation came. For those involved—all the more for blood kin of those involved—those feelings would be all the stronger.

Therefore, it was natural that Reinhard would wish to speak with those involved about the White Whale's subjugation.

Felt: "He's a piss-me-off bastard."

With that consideration for Reinhard in mind, Felt, who had accepted Anastasia's invitation, vented such complaints at Reinhard, who would not voice such desires at all himself. And since telling Reinhard the facts would make Felt suffer, that made things troublesome.

Rom: "From where I stand, you and that "Sword Saint" whippersnapper are six of one, half a dozen of the other."

Felt: "Huhh? I'm the one bein' jerked around, no matter how ya slice it! And anyway, Anastasia-neechan's got a rotten personality too. She made a big show of tellin' us she invited the other candidates… it's obvious she wants us to hear 'bout the White Whale."

Felt's sullen phrasing, but of course Anastasia had not stated it outright. Old Man Rom agreed she likely had such an intent, but she had probably also meant it as a test.

Whether Felt would notice that hidden intent. And if she noticed it, whether she would choose to go along with that intent for her knight Reinhard's sake. —It was a touchstone to see how Felt and Reinhard's lord-vassal relationship had changed since the start of the Royal Selection.

If Felt had failed to notice the intent and flatly refused with "Like we'd accept an enemy's invitation," then Anastasia's evaluation of Felt would have been decided on the spot.

Rom: "She shows a fair bit of friendly pretense, yet she's a most thorough lass, that one."

Felt: "Right? Can't let my guard down 'round her, not at all."

Beside the disgruntled Felt, Old Man Rom felt a déjà vu with Anastasia's tack. Not that he knew someone with the same method, but he felt her way of thinking was close to his.

Anastasia’s way of fighting was a fang honed so that those who had not could fight those who had. At times, more than polishing swordplay, it became a weapon designed to stop the other’s breath outright.

However—

Rom: “My granddaughter ain’t so soft as to be killed by that so easily either. Heh, she’s something.”

Felt: “…What’s up with you, Rom-ji. Grinning like that—creeps me out.”

Rom: “Wahahaha. Nothing—just that feeling a sign of good things to come is no bad thing.”

With a suspicious narrowing of her red eyes and a “Hah?” Felt found her head roughly tousled by a giant’s palm; sitting on the floor, Old Man Rom slowly stood up.

He had, more or less, grasped both Felt’s will and the camp’s policy.

Rom: “Needless to say, don’t you dare get careless. Even if the “Sword Saint” is there.”

Felt: “Hah. If I’d been leanin’ on that guy and only that all this time, the Kingdom of Lugunica woulda been a wasteland ages ago.”

Rom: “No doubt.”

Exchanging a warped-cheek grin with Felt’s crooked grin, Old Man Rom left her private room. Ducking his huge frame through the door and stepping into the corridor, he happened to come face to face with someone just then coming up to the second floor.

Reinhard: “Rom-dono, were you speaking with Felt-sama?”

Rom: “Aye. A bit about the Watergate City invitation.”

Reinhard: “Anastasia-sama’s call for proactive information exchange among the candidates, yes. I was surprised Felt-sama accepted without hesitation, but…”

The one who said that, the corners of his blue eyes drooping, was Reinhard the “Sword Saint,” much spoken of. Felt’s knight, and the person used as bait as a reason for Anastasia to invite this camp to Priestella.

However—

Rom: “What did you think of that invitation?”

Reinhard: “Anastasia-sama is a painstaking person. Since she invited not only Felt-sama but the other Royal Selection candidates as well, I doubt she intends to host mere opinion exchanges, tea parties, or banquets. I think it highly likely that some manner of business talk or negotiation will be proposed, but—”

Rom: “But?”

Reinhard: “Unfortunately, even if I rack my brains, from here on it would seem best to borrow the wisdom of you, Rom-dono, and Ezzo-dono.”

Scratching his own cheek with a finger, Reinhard answered as if he knew his own bailiwick.

It was neither modesty nor sarcasm, but what one should call a relinquishing of thought born of sound judgment. It included the right person in the right place, and expectation and trust in his own people, but it lacked the most important perspective.

Exactly as Felt had said.

Rom: “Good grief, looks like a hard road ahead.”

Reinhard: “Rom-dono?”

Rom: “As you say, the lass named Anastasia will have her share of designs. If we’re leapin’ into the other’s bosom, we go in ready to be at a disadvantage. You understand?”

Reinhard: “—Yes. Overturning that disadvantage and bringing benefit to my liege is my duty.”

At Reinhard's solemn nod, Old Man Rom left it at that for the moment. He stepped aside to let him pass, for he would no doubt head for Felt's room.

Rom: "It's prickly in there—do your best not to get bitten."

Reinhard: "That's as usual."

In Reinhard's wry answer lay the crystallization of the time he had built up with Felt in his own way. Receiving that, Old Man Rom shrugged his large shoulders; Reinhard slipped past him, knocked on the door to Felt's room, and was seen being invited in.

Hearing again, through the door, the two of them—mostly the aftershocks of Felt biting at him—Old Man Rom went downstairs, looking for the figure of the camp's strategist, the smallfolk man.

There were many things to discuss and consult on.

Rom: "Even if my granddaughter's growth is remarkable, that doesn't mean the seeds of my worry are all gone."

Felt had grown, and their relationship with Reinhard, too, showed improvement; the definite shape of them as lord and vassal had begun to appear. —At first, Old Man Rom had been opposed to Felt's participation in the Royal Selection. Yet, ironically, it was with himself as the trigger that Felt decided to take part in her fate.

In that case, all Old Man Rom could do was offer up as much as possible of the time he had piled up in vain and what he had cultivated thereby, so that Felt's resolve and way of walking would not dim.

For the time being—

Rom: "Since she's loath to rely on Reinhard, I must prepare means to grant that selfishness. Honestly, what a handful."

Saying so, the mouth of the aged giant nonetheless bore a firm smile.

Heinkel: “Heard the Hoshin Company and the royal family’s survivor are gonna meet face-to-face in the Watergate City. Word is the Karsten ducal house got tapped too. Maybe the candidates are fixin’ to strike some kinda secret deal among themselves?”

A red-haired man, wearing the face of someone loudly reporting his great achievement, appeared in the dining hall; Al, cursing the man’s lousy timing, set down his meal.

One-armed and unable to remove the helmet he wore—that was Al. He was long since used to it, but Al’s mealtimes required more knack and focus than they looked. At the very least, it was not the sort of thing he could easily continue while fretting over how the conversation would unfold next.

Heinkel: “Hey, you listenin’, Lady Priscilla? This ain’t the kinda info you get every day. If I weren’t around, they might’ve beaten us to the punch. Am I right?”

Ignoring Al’s inward jangling nerves, the red-haired man—Heinkel Astrea—pulled a dissatisfied face and tone, pressing the mistress seated at the far end of the long table for a reply.

But there was no answer to Heinkel’s urging. Of course not. Being prompted, having demands placed upon her, and meekly acceding… there was no one in the world to whom that suited less than her.

Priscilla Barielle—she was Al’s liege, the Sun Princess whose will burned exactly as she pleased.

Silent, Priscilla deftly plied her silverware, continuing her sumptuous meal with ladylike grace.

Priscilla’s beauty of appearance went without saying, but even her deportment and etiquette were flawless; whether ornaments or otherwise, she compromised on nothing that adorned her person. Not merely the fact she had things made to order by master artisans—the essence dwelling in her very way of being would make one swoon, even after one grew used to it.

Yet the beautiful rose has thorns. And the true terror of that rose is when those thorns are the kind that bring death to what they touch.

Therefore—

Heinkel: “How long are you going to keep eating?. My words—”

Priscilla: “—Be silent, commoner. Even were it shining with a golden brilliance, nothing shall bend my will. Think not so highly of thyself.”

Heinkel: “Guh…”

She said it with a snap; Heinkel twisted his face as if in humiliation, yet her reply was the second-kindest among those Al had imagined.

The only ones who got the kindest were those she fancied very much, or Schult; in effect, one could say Heinkel had rolled the best outcome. For the record, Al had expected anything below third would involve physical chastisement, so he let out a breath of relief.

Be that as it may, Priscilla showed no sign of being in any hurry.

Al: “So it’s Anastasia-san and the Duchess, and the girl your son serves. When three Royal Candidates meet face-to-face, yeah, you do kinda start wonderin’ what they’re schemin’.”

Heinkel: “Right? Leave it be and they might pull a “grand alliance,” for all we know. I don’t care how well Princess’s domain’s doin’—if they squeeze us from three sides, we’ll be gaspin’.”

Al: “Hey now, I’m tryin’ to steer you away from pokin’ the Princess’s wrath for nothin’…”

Fiddling with the helmet’s clasp and clicking it, Al found his nerves jangling again at Heinkel’s careless stance.

Heinkel’s death-defying tightrope act showed far too little fear where Priscilla was concerned. Just imagining a time when “it couldn’t be helped” would not cut it made his spine go cold. If that time actually came, Al saw no future where Priscilla would spare him.

Even if the circumstances under which Heinkel had joined their camp—that he had not been drawn to Priscilla's royal vessel, but that he had taken a position to deal with her in exchange for lending her his name and standing—were what they were.

Heinkel, pleading there was something he simply had to have, had, surprisingly enough, been devoting himself here and there to win Priscilla's favor and contribute to the camp.

Catching wind of the other candidates' movements this time was part of that.

Heinkel: "As for House Astrea, I'm still the head even now. The domain's packed with folks under my wing. It's the same all across the kingdom. Folks lining up to curry favor with me… with House Astrea and the Sword Saint? They never stop."

Al: "So you traced those connections and got this info. Sounds believable."

Heinkel: "Naturally. I have corroboration."

Heinkel, showing his shrewdness, curled his lips in pride. All the more reason Al could only wonder why he so misread the distance he ought to keep with Priscilla.

Then—

Priscilla: "—What of the silver-haired half-devil?"

Heinkel: "Huh?"

At the single question Priscilla let fall, Heinkel's eyes went round. Folding the napkin with which she had wiped her lips, just as she finished her meal, Priscilla's crimson eyes met his.

Priscilla: "There is yet another candidate, the half-devil, is there not. If the topic is Royal Selection candidates, then even for the sake of making up the numbers, that one must be included. Hast thou no tongue to speak to that one's movements?"

Heinkel: "…Nothin's leaked out about that camp beyond rumors. The backer, the Mathers fellow's doin' well. But so what? A half-elf ain't even worth talkin' about."

Priscilla: "Hm."

Heinkel: "The Mathers guy's been an unreadable sort from way back. Even so, I figured he wasn't a fool… but cartin' out a half-elf? Looks like he's gone off his rocker."

Arms folded, Heinkel spat the words with irritation. At his attitude, Al raised an eyebrow inside his helmet and let out a breathy "Heh."

Al: "Huh, you knew that margrave from the sticks? Didn't know that."

Heinkel: "Really just face-familiar, that's all. A handful of times in the capital, more than ten years ago… h-hell, that's beside the point! More importantly—"

Priscilla: "—The meeting in the Watergate City, was it."

Needled in a past he did not want touched, Heinkel snapped back at Al's remark. Picking up his words, Priscilla spoke; "That's right!" he raised his voice.

Excited, nostrils flaring, he clenched a fist.

Heinkel: "Lucky for us, the other side hasn't got a bead on our movements. We can cook things however we like on our end. So then…"

Priscilla: "If the slum girl and the Duchess move, then thy bloodline shall surely come as well."

Heinkel: "Uh—"

Priscilla: "If that is so, then taking thee along shall amuse me."

Caught flat-footed by Priscilla, Heinkel's expression stiffened; Al pressed a hand to his brow with an “ah, crap.”

The complicated environment surrounding Heinkel—or rather, House Astrea—was something Al had heard, if only in outline. Of course, it was not as if he had drunk together with the man and dug deep into how the parties felt in their hearts but—

Heinkel: “…”

A glance at the silent, wordless Heinkel made it plain he felt anything but at ease.

And Priscilla had more or less guessed how he felt even before she saw his face.

Priscilla: “What is wrong. This is news thou thyself hast presented, is it not. The fruits of that news—seeing them with none other than thine own eyes is only proper.”

Heinkel: “…O-Of course. Yeah. Yeah, that’s right. Fine, I will go with you. I just so happen to have a thing or two I wanted to say to Father and to the Sword Saint.”

Whether the trembling in his voice came from excitement or fear—or both—Heinkel muttered so and took Priscilla’s proposal, whether or not it was a provocation.

Hearing that, Priscilla gave a solemn dip of her chin.

Priscilla: “I shall remember thy service. In the Watergate City also, answer my diversions in that manner. —Thou mayest withdraw.”

Heinkel: “—I will keep feelers out. Make ready for a trip.”

Adding that at the end, Heinkel strode from the dining hall. Deliberately straightening a back that wanted to hunch, making unnecessarily loud footfalls—watching his retreating back, Al let out a long, long sigh.

Priscilla: “What is it, Al. With such sighs, dost thou mean to dampen even my spirits?”

Al: “No such intention at all, but ain’t you pokin’ the old man a bit too hard? Honestly, watchin’ it had me all on edge… more like, achin’ just to look at.”

Saying so, Al resumed the meal he had paused. Sadly, the food that ought to have been warm had gone cold, and did nothing to warm Al’s chilled chest.

Al: “The Duchess, and the Sword Saint’s little miss… Just imaginin’ three generations comin’ face to face gives me stomach pains. Even if you do think the old man’s kinda clownish.”

Still ignoring poor manners, Al went on eating and talking at once. At his words, Priscilla closed one eye and called him briefly.

Priscilla: “Al.”

Priscilla: “Presume not to fix my thoughts with such witless logic. It is disrespectful.”

Al: “My bad, but what’s the witless logic?”

Priscilla: “That thou shouldst call that baseborn man a “pierrot”… a clown. To so judge him.”

Al: “It ain’t? I figured the Princess saw the old man that way.”

The unexpected point made Al honestly surprised.

Even to outside eyes not of the parties, Heinkel’s position and circumstances were harsh and bitter. Priscilla had a tendency to relish such human anguish and the sight of those who writhed in torment.

Whether one saw that as mere bad taste, or as an esteem for those who struggled to better their lives—each person who dealt with Priscilla could judge for themselves. But—

Al: “Between his father and his son, the old man’s caught in a vise, and he’s still bustin’ his back for his wife—that’s just the facts, yeah? I figured the Princess rated him for that.”

Priscilla: “Such an assessment is but a tracing of the surface. It is true I have interest in how that despicable man will shoulder a doom not suited to his stature, and where that road shall end… but he cannot be called a clown. He lacks self-awareness.”

Al: “Self-awareness…”

Priscilla: “Al, thou art aware of thine own clownery, art thou not. Between one who is mocked and one who is scorned, that is the distinction.”

Al: “…”

Priscilla: “Even I have seasons when I would laugh at something. Yet for the sake of that one in a thousand times, I shall not keep an ugly thing at my side.”

Seeking to understand Priscilla, who spoke thus, Al fell silent and set his thoughts to work.

The phrasing was abstruse; the philosophy suggested a high wall that refused others’ understanding. Even so, Al wished to grasp the will of the Sun Princess that poured down from there.

Not, “lest he spoil her mood.”—But because Al believed the reason he had ceased to be the Following Star lay in that very radiance of hers.

Priscilla: “Again, thy hand has stilled.”

Al: “…Ah, my bad, my bad. I’ll polish it off right away.”

Priscilla: “I do not mean to hasten thee. Thy manner of eating is unusual; it is not altogether dull.”

Al: “Even if I know I’m a clown, havin’ someone stare while I’m eatin’ ain’t exactly relaxin’.”

Priscilla: “There are times thou watchest my meals in silence as well.”

Called out on what he had thought he was sneaking peeks at, Al groaned “ugh” and gave up.

She was inured to the gaze of others; a glance or two Al sent through his visor had meant nothing to her.

Al: “For the record, the only thing I was thinkin’ was that the way you eat is both real pretty and kinda erotic, Princess.”

Priscilla: “Fool.”

With a single, crisp dismissal, Al conceded defeat and returned to his meal. Watching him with a glass of wine in one hand, Priscilla stroked her own lips with the other.

And—

Priscilla: “—Though the dullard said otherwise, the half-devil shall also have been called to the Watergate City.”

Al: “…Why do you think that?”

Priscilla: “If one judges the merits and labors of each camp from the start of the Royal Selection until now, the conclusion is obvious. If it is a scheme by the vixen, her purpose is easy to read.”

Al: “—The merchant boss lady’s purpose is to become king, yeah?”

Priscilla: “Just so.”

With a quiet nod that said “thou hast grasped mine intent,” Priscilla assented; Al pondered beside her.

If Anastasia had called not only Crusch and Felt, but truly even Emilia’s camp—what was her aim. It had been a year since the Royal Selection began; even if the struggle as a whole lasted three, perhaps they had been too leisurely.

Al: “If that’s how it is, then this might really be a fine play by the old man.”

Priscilla: “If so, then the commoner brings tidings of use; Schult brings charm. Now, in what manner shalt thou contribute to my amusement?”

Al: “Other than entertainin’ the Princess with my words and conduct?”

Priscilla: “Keeping a clown at my side is my caprice, not thy work. If thou wouldst win my favor, then wheeze—be it in misery or in pluck, or in some different fashion.”

The way she might well have added “Else—” made Al give a small shrug.

Even if one was taken into her household, one could not grow complacent and idle at Priscilla’s side.

Our Sun Princess loved rice-ears that grew straight and strong under the sun.

In that regard, rather—

Al: “Maybe the one who can’t read the room ain’t the old man, but me.”

For good or ill, Heinkel’s way—striving in earnest to change the status quo—was the right one here.

Taking from Heinkel this tightening of awareness, Al set down his fork. Finishing his meal, he jammed the napkin up under his helmet at the chin and wiped his mouth, then stood.

Al: “Thanks for the grub. I’ll go do a bit of work, walk it off.”

Priscilla: “At last. Thou hast escaped with thy life, Al.”

Al: “Don’t sound like a joke, so I’m dead serious—the Princess is scary.”

Priscilla, putting the wine glass to her lips, said no more to Al’s back as he turned.

Only—had Al failed to grasp the intent between her words, she would have dismissed him without a thought as unworthy to keep by her side. —In truth, that would not have been the first time, nor the last.

So long as he waited upon Priscilla, it was a risk that would always exist and must be swallowed.

Al: “All right then, guess I’ll go pick up the stuff the old man missed.”

A transparent fawning for her favor—as plain as day—would only earn her ire; for the moment, this was the only tribute Al could think of.

Unfortunately, as a drifter and a suspicious vagabond, Al did not possess the kind of information network Heinkel used; prying into the well-secured Meathers Domain was no easy feat.

—No easy feat, but not impossible.

Al: “There’s that thing where if you go friend-of-a-friend six steps, you could know even the president.”

Naturally, it was a notion that needed heaps of time and opportunity, but luckily, neither posed a problem for Al. All that remained was where to start.

Al: “For a socially awkward old guy, gettin’ a bunch of folks goin’ “huh?” at me ain’t exactly a treat. So—do me a favor and show up fast, Mr. President.”

Muttering thus, Al set off for the nearest village to start, for the time being.

He bathed in the fiercely pouring sunlight, squinting at the glare through his visor—

—laughing that not even the true sun’s twinkling could match the Sun Princess’s.

6

Mimi: “So, so, amaaazing—Garf, feels great! Mimi went goro-goro—

DOOON!”

Joshua: “A-And, she was like this the entire way back… Anyway, Emilia-sama sent a very favorable reply that she would be delighted to accept the invitation.”

Hopping up and down with her long tail sticking straight up, Mimi capered about. While she bounded left and right, Joshua reported that he had fulfilled his duty as messenger.

As vice-captain of the Iron Fangs, he had taken Mimi, the eldest of the cat-person triplets, and headed to the den of demons—the Mathers Domain—where all manner of rumors swirled. They had successfully delivered the invitation, and had even brought back a positive reply on the spot; he allowed himself some pride that he had done a fully sufficient job as a messenger.

Joshua: “Having Mimi with me—leaving aside the propriety for a messenger—was reassuring.”

Anastasia: “That so, that so. Then it was right askin’ Joshua to play babysitter for Mimi. That said, Emilia-san’s camp was the easiest to invite anyhow.”

Bringing her small palms together before her chest, Anastasia, who had come to meet up with Joshua and the others, let her lips soften.

Unable to read his lady’s mind, Joshua involuntarily drew his slim brows together. Catching the crease between them, Anastasia tapped her own brow with a finger.

Anastasia: “Keep frown lines up that often and they’ll get stuck that way, ya know?”

Joshua: “M-My apologies, I’m inexperienced. Er, may I ask—why do you say Emilia-sama’s camp is the easiest to deal with? Isn’t it the opposite?”

Anastasia: “Hm? Aha… So Joshua’s takin’ all them rumors ‘bout Emilia-san’s lot at face value, huh. Well, can’t talk, seein’ as at first I wouldn’t even deal with ‘em over the half-elf and all that myself.”

With the same hand that had touched her brow, Anastasia delicately touched her cheek. There was a faintly self-reflective tone to her murmur, and Joshua blinked.

It was true that Joshua had been at his wits' end over the outrageous rumors surrounding Emilia's camp. But from the sound of it, Anastasia made those rumors out to be utter nonsense, baseless scuttlebutt with no credibility.

Anastasia: "Truth is, I ain't finished sortin' how much of those tales got embellishments. But meetin' the real ones—how were they? Were they the scaaary folks the rumors said?"

Joshua: "—It was only a short time, so perhaps they simply didn't let anything slip."

Or perhaps, since Joshua and the others had come as Anastasia's envoys, they simply could not recklessly bare their fangs.

Joshua: "Only… Emilia-sama did not give me the impression of the Witch I'd heard in the rumors."

Emilia was a half-elf by birth, with silver hair and amethyst eyes—traits she shared in many ways with the symbol of fear in this world, the Witch of Envy. And yet, she had, Joshua thought, welcomed him as a messenger and treated him gently.

The rumored "Military Internal Affairs Officer" who watched them without dropping his guard had been frightening, though.

At that point Joshua realized that it sounded as if he were defending or trying to speak well of members of the Emilia camp.

Joshua: "My apologies! I swear I have no lessened will to support you, Anastasia-sama, nor would my eyes wander to anyone else…"

Mimi: "Huh? Joshua, what's up? Talkin' super fast—didja do something bad?"

Joshua: "I did not! Um, really—really, really!"

Silencing Mimi, who had tilted her head with no ill will, Joshua pleaded so strongly it was almost shameful. At his fluster, Anastasia covered her mouth and tittered.

Anastasia: “Ain’t doubtin’ that at all—what a funny child you are. And thinkin’ Emilia-san didn’t feel “Witch-like”—that’s your true feelin’, ain’t it? Treasure your own feelings. Workin’ with a lid clapped on your heart, you can’t eat tasty meals, can ya?”

Mimi: “So true—! Best is eat only what you love!”

Anastasia: “That’s a li’l different in meanin’, but you’re cute so I’ll let it slide.”

Patting beaming Mimi’s head, Anastasia looked to Joshua. Drowned in her pale-green gaze, Joshua lowered his eyes without thinking.

He did have cause to reflect when told he was putting a lid on his own feelings. But he did not wish to open that lid. As someone who looked up to Anastasia—who affirmed desire—he wondered if that way of thinking might be unbefitting.

Anastasia: “Joshua, I—”

Lowering her tone ever so slightly, Anastasia began to say something to the now-silent Joshua—but a sudden interruption got in the way.

Hetaro: “Big sis! Did you come back with Joshua-san?!”

With brisk, fluttering footsteps, it was Hetaro who threw open the inn’s entrance.

Mimi’s little brother, the cat-person boy who doted on his sister, spotted Joshua and the others talking out in the inn’s garden, widened his round eyes, and ran over.

Mimi: “Ah, Hetaro! Like ya see—Mimi’s back too! Messenger duty—accomplished!”

Hetaro: “Welcome back! Nothing happened?”

Mimi: “Nn~, a little! Garf! Goro-Goro—DOOON!”

Hetaro: “Eh? Eh? Eh?”

Catching her pouncing brother, Mimi spread her arms wide as she answered. Hetaro’s eyes went black-and-white at that answer; he looked to Joshua for the details. But Joshua, who had been subjected to goro-goro—DOOON the whole way back, did not know the particulars either.

Joshua: “Er, the “Garf” Mimi’s talking about is a Military Officer in Emilia-sama’s camp. It seems to be a nickname for one called Garfiel; Mimi seems to have gotten close with him, however…”

Hetaro: “G-Garfiel? I don’t know him, I don’t know him… Big sis? With that person?”

Mimi: “Garf? One look and it went goro-goro—DOOON! The thing Roshi said! Mimi’s finally at fallin’-age!”

Hetaro: “Gaaaan—!!”

Clapping both hands to her cheeks and smiling brightly, Mimi left Hetaro turning white right in front of her. So unlike the always-Mimi-favoring Hetaro was his reaction that Joshua could not hide his confusion either.

Had becoming friends with someone from an opposing camp made him feel a sense of crisis?

Tivey: “Honestly, both big sis and big bro are hopeless, yes.”

At the sight of Mimi and Hetaro, Tivey came out of the inn late and muttered in exasperation. The triplets’ youngest adjusted his monocle; spotting Joshua, he raised a hand.

Tivey: “Joshua-san, thank you for minding big sis, yes.”

Joshua: “Not at all. Tivey, Hetaro—you returned quickly as well. Were Mimi and I the last?”

Tivey: “I just got back too, yes. Big bro’s been antsy the whole time.”

Joshua: “I see. …How did your work go, you two?”

Tivey answered Joshua’s question with, “Both big bro and I completed ours safely, yes,” and—

Tivey: “Felt-sama and Crusch-sama will also accept the young lady’s invitation, yes. So the Hoshin Company’s comfort trip is postponed, yes.”

Joshua: “That is… well, only natural. Emilia-sama, whom we visited, will also gladly come to the Watergate City. That means the Royal Candidates will all be gathered… well, not all.”

All the invited Royal Candidates would be gathered in the Watergate City. —The result was that one camp only would be left out.

Joshua: “I have heard that the Sun Princess, Priscilla Barielle-sama, is an eccentric as well, however…”

Tivey: “She seems a bad match with the young lady, yes. So it might be a snub, yes.”

Anastasia: “Hey now, I can hear ya.”

Her tone was too gentle to call it anger; at her words, Tivey gave a little twitch of his shoulders. Stroking the fox scraf at her neck, Anastasia went on,

Anastasia: “Don’t say things that sound so bad. It’s just I couldn’t find a reason to call on her, that’s all.”

Joshua: “Like with Felt-sama —would “let’s talk, it’s been a while” not do?”

Anastasia: “At Felt-san’s place, that’s part of how we invited ‘em, but it ain’t just that. With the Princess, though, it’d end up just like that… and then we’re the ones callin’ her out and makin’ ourselves owe her, ain’t we?”

At Anastasia’s one-eyed wink, Joshua and Tivey tilted their heads together.

There seemed to be some high-level bargaining going on that Joshua could not grasp, but no matter how he thought about why the conditions would differ for Felt and Priscilla, no answer came.

Waving a hand at their reaction, Anastasia said, “Well, no matter,”

Anastasia: “More importantly, when our guests arrive, we’ll be on the hostin’ side… The time to enjoy the Watergate City’s limited anyhow, so how ‘bout we take a look ‘round the inn?”

Mimi: “Ah! Great idea, young lady! So when Garf and the others come, Mimi can show ‘em around —better do a suuuper thorough explore of the inn!”

Hetaro: “Big sis, that “Garf” person is… ah! Wait!”

At Anastasia’s proposal, Mimi and Hetaro pattered off into the inn. At their momentum, Joshua and Tivey looked at each other and burst into laughter.

At long last, it felt as if the tension had drained from his shoulders.

Tivey: “Shall we go too, Joshua? I’ll teach you the Kararagi style, yes.”

Joshua: “I’d appreciate it. …Honestly, I’ve been at a loss since I first saw the inn’s gate.”

Though he had knowledge of the Kararagi-imported Wafuu architecture, this was his first time seeing a building using the style so boldly. Including that the entry doors slid sideways, there seemed to be a mountain of rules sleeping in the inn that Joshua did not know.

Joshua: “But as hosts, we must make sure we do not make any lapses… I cannot let my brother or Anastasia-sama be shamed…”

Anastasia: “Don’t go thinkin’ yourself into a tizzy. At first even sittin’ proper on tatami won’t come easy.”

Joshua: “No, that will not do! Compromise and slackness are not of the Juukulius!”

There was no such proverb, but as a house of the Finest of Knights—Julius—it would be fitting to pass that down as a creed. Rather, Joshua felt he himself ought to actively spread it as the house's proverb from now on.

With that resolve, he was about to head for the inn's entrance with Tivey when—

Joshua: "Come to think, Anastasia-sama, were you not about to say something to me earlier?"

Suddenly remembering the remark cut off by Hetaro's entrance, Joshua asked Anastasia. At his words, Anastasia pressed a finger to her lips, went "Mm~," and thought for a moment before—

Anastasia: "Let's not, for now. Looks like Tivey's fixin' to cram ya with Kararagi style, and gettin' your head all jumbled's no good either."

Joshua: "Not hearing what you were going to say will be "jumbled" in its own way, however…"

Anastasia: "Don't be petty—be a good boy. Go on now, get along with Tivey, 'kay?"

As a worrywart, Joshua felt tugged at the back of his mind, but since Anastasia had said so, he could not press further. In truth, knowing his memory was not the best, he ought to focus on mastering the Kararagi etiquette looming before him.

Joshua: "When the Candidates arrive, we must not commit any discourtesies."

So admonishing himself, Joshua followed after Tivey's back and stepped into the inn.

—In the end, during this stay in the Watergate City, the chance for Joshua to hear what Anastasia had been about to say never came. And due to certain circumstances, that, for a long, long time, would be lost even from the Memory of the parties involved.

Chapter 2:
The Day of Arrival: Daytime

1

Al: “Come to think of it, I hear Priestella’s got a Songstress who’s all the rage right now.”

Schult: “The Songstress-sama… Does that mean there’s another princess besides Priscilla-sama?”

Leaning his weight against the dragon carriage’s backrest, Al kicked off some small talk; the boy across from him tilted his head.

The pageboy butler with fluffy, curly pink hair who looked perfect in short pants—Schult.

Priscilla’s favorite, he was a young child accompanying them on this journey as well. To his innocent question, Al toyed with the clasp of his helmet and looked out the window,

Al: “There’s more than just our Princess, see. Not that she’s an actual highborn princess, yeah? The kingdom’s real princesses kicked the bucket a little while back. Songstress is just a nickname… like a pet name.”

Schult: “A pet name… The Songstress is someone who sings songs, yes? To be treated like a princess for that is amazing! She must sing truly amazing songs, without a doubt!”

Eyes round and sparkling with expectation, Schult clenched his little fists; Al gave a wry smile.

This little boy, saved from the brink of starvation by Priscilla and whimsically taken on as her retainer, revered his benefactor as a goddess—no, as the sun itself.

Hearing that there existed, like the “Sun Princess” Priscilla, someone nicknamed “Princess”—the Songstress—his hopes shot through the roof.

And then—

Priscilla: “Enough, Schult. Do not frolic like a tail-wagging puppy. In the first place, to call someone known for skill in the performing arts a “Songstress”… what a grossly grandiose form of address.”

So said the Sun Princess herself, seated beside Schult.

Drawing a fan from the valley of her abundant bosom, she tapped the tip lightly against Schult’s head, taking issue with the disrespect of setting the Songstress alongside herself.

Priscilla’s way was to be ever fair—by looking down on anything that was not herself. She had, after all, at first refused to acknowledge even the existence of fellow Royal Candidates. Different fields or not, to speak as though the Sun Princess and the Songstress were peers—no wonder she took offense.

Had anyone but Schult said it, they would have needed to prepare for a caning that drew blood. However—

Schult: “Ah… I beg your pardon. I grew curious about what kind of songs she sings, and I let myself get carried away.”

Priscilla: “So long as thou reflectest, it is well. That a child should show interest in the arts is only natural. Once rusted over like Al, even if thou polishest, those fresh sensibilities shall not spring back to life.”

Al: “Hey, hey, why’d you jab me outta nowhere just now?”

Priscilla: “Ho? Then art thou claiming thy sensibilities are every bit as fresh as Schult’s?”

Al: “I’m sayin’ you could spare me, like, half the kindness you show Schult-chan, yeah? It ain’t like nothin’ you say can hurt me.”

Schult’s slip of the tongue was magnanimously forgiven, while Al got used as the butt of the joke in passing.

He was long accustomed to the treatment, but for the sake of his human rights he lodged a token protest. Of course, all that earned him was a snort and Priscilla's silence.

Al: "Sheesh… I won't beat Schult-chan, but I rate myself as pretty darn devoted too, y'know. I did bring you the intel you wanted, didn't I?"

Priscilla: "—It seems even the half-devil's camp has been invited to the Watergate City."

Al: "That's the one. Took a fair bit of digging, you know?"

He waved a hand, making his claim in an airy tone. In response, Priscilla propped her cheek on one hand, narrowed her crimson eyes, and recrossed her legs.

No derisive snort, no mockery-laced rebuke—her way of acknowledging him, in its way. Even so, Al knew that taking it that way meant he'd been trained too well.

—At present, Priscilla's camp had departed the Barielle domain and was heading to the Watergate City, where, under Anastasia Hoshin's initiative, a Royal Candidates' gathering would be held.

Their dragon carriage had already reached the great main gate before the city; once through inspection, they would enter.

The city's guards manning the checkpoint oversaw with high morale the people and goods coming into and out of Priestella. They could have revealed their identities and cut the inspection line—but—

Priscilla: "If we make a needless spectacle of ourselves, the vixenes already inside will catch on. Having come this far beneath the surface, we shall spend it to the end for the sake of the entertainment."

Al: "A Princess who'll swallow a little inconvenience for the sake of a surprise—I don't hate it."

Priscilla: "Fool. Do not speak so irreverently. —Therefore, see that thou impress it upon that one as well.”

She snorted and jerked her chin; Al glanced toward the edge of the carriage.

The lavish dragon carriage that had left the Barielle domain with Priscilla aboard was large and spacious—almost wasted with only four passengers besides the driver. Priscilla sat in stately fashion in the middle; Al and Schult flanked her front and side.

And the last one, sprawled a bit apart with his back to the seat and wall,

Heinkel: “Gulp, gulp… phaa.”

The liquor he had swigged down roughly ran from the corner of his mouth; he wiped it with the back of his hand and breathed out alcohol-reeking air.

Naturally, the one doing it was none other than Heinkel Astrea. He spent most hours with a drink in hand as it was, but on this trip his intake was plainly higher—visibly so the nearer they drew to Priestella.

No doubt he had in mind the reunion awaiting him in the Watergate City. He drank not to raise his spirits, but like administering anesthetic to numb the pain.

In fact, Heinkel had spent almost the entire travel time in a drunken haze; it was questionable whether he had even registered that the carriage had reached Priestella and was waiting on inspection. If he had, by now he’d likely be angry at being kept waiting, throwing his weight around and barking at the guards.

Al: “Given that, pokin’ him might be worse than warnin’ him not to make trouble, yeah?”

Priscilla: “Ho? Thou wouldst defy mine order? In that case, I leave the handling of that pent-up one to thee. By no misstep shalt thou render meaningless the fact that I have deigned to come in secret.”

Al: “Ugh, talk about kickin’ a hornet’s nest.”

Priscilla’s lips curved in a blood-red smile; Al couldn’t help but groan.

The hellscape of an unmotivated middle-aged man being saddled with nursing a drunk middle-aged man. Then a savior, having heard Al’s lament, called, “Al-sama, Al-sama,” Schult: “Even if you’re worried, it’s all right! Heinkel-sama will surely cooperate properly if it’s for Priscilla-sama!”

Al: “Whether it’s “for the Princess” or not, he probably means to cooperate. But booze is scary ‘cause it guts those premises and resolutions right from the roots.”

Schult: “Then I will carry lots of water to Heinkel-sama!”

Rolling up the sleeves of his livery, he windmilled arms as thin as saplings. Schult’s every move was calculatedly cute, but his earnestness and consideration sank straight into Al’s heart.

Maybe stirring up that sight in the boy was part of Priscilla’s design too.

Al: “…Man, you got me.”

To be frank, Al wasn’t exactly keen on coming to the Watergate City.

Sure, there was a desire to avoid being put in a tight spot in the Royal Selection—other candidates banding together and Priscilla standing alone against them. But while probing the Emilia camp’s movements at Priscilla’s behest, Al had also sensed bad omens.

When an incident happens, there’s a suitable stage and a cast that give it a start.

Let those with strong, great influence in the world gather, and it can become the opening of a new tale. —Like the disturbances around the royal capital Lugunica last year when the Royal Selection was proclaimed.

The White Whale appeared; a Witch Cult faction ran rampant; disasters on par with acts of god came crashing down all at once—calamities so rare they shouldn't crop up no matter where in the world you looked.

Luckily, Priscilla's bad itch hadn't acted up then, and Al and the others escaped harm—but—

Al: "This time, no matter what I say, she won't hear it. Once the Princess says it, she ain't takin' it back."

When Heinkel had first reported on this gathering, Al had thought the same: only Priscilla could change Priscilla's mind.

She might lend an ear to the words of those attending at her side—Al and Schult—but that was Priscilla's mercy, not anything like happily taking stern counsel.

Al knew that even if you hoped for a thousand, ten thousand, nayuta chances, that would never change.

So at the very least, what Al could do—

Al: "Sorry to the old man, but my priority order's the Princess and me, then Schult-chan beneath that."

Ultimately, Al recognized nothing as absolute in his win condition but Priscilla's survival.

His own life was a given, so perhaps it was better phrased as nothing absolute besides Al and Priscilla's survival. If possible, he wanted to save other lives too, so long as it didn't run counter to that aim.

But that, too, was neither absolute, nor a goal to be forced and achieved at any cost.

Schult: "Priscilla-sama, we're almost at inspection. Once that's done, we'll be able to lay eyes on the Watergate City! I'm excited!"

Priscilla: "I have heard it is a fair city. Let us see whether it can indeed delight mine eyes."

Schult: “Yes! I am sure we shall have even Priscilla-sama’s satisfaction!”

While Al mulled, Schult was making grand promises to Priscilla.

With the Great Main Gate blocking the view of the streets, it was one heck of a glib assurance. Yet with not a speck of malice or vanity in it—only pure good will to please his mistress—Priscilla did not censure him.

She quietly closed one eye, set a hand atop Schult’s head as he peered forward in anticipation, then looked Al’s way in place of chiding the boy.

Priscilla: “I expect no endearing charms from thee, but offer at least a word or two to amuse my heart—if not to Schult’s degree. Do not show me that cheerless face alone.”

Al: “…Since I started wearin’ this helmet, I’ve been passin’ for an iron-mask poker face, y’know.”

Priscilla: “Fool. Thy mug shows through though it be covered in black iron. Whom dost thou take me for?”

Al: “Well, yeah, but…”

Priscilla: “Cast aside such worthless inner turmoil. Thou knowest it. —This world is arranged for my convenience.”

At Priscilla’s unchanging cadence, Al felt a twinge of chagrin and fiddled with his helmet clasp.

He was aware he was on edge. In that sense, he had no right to laugh at Heinkel. With the chance to come face to face with father and son ahead of them, Al sympathized with the man who took refuge in drink.

If only Al could drink, maybe it’d be different—but sadly, he was a lightweight.

Al: “Man, seriously… the thought of meetin’ face-to-face is weighin’ heavy, bro.”

Even as he thought himself shameless, Al let out a self-deprecating chuckle inside the helmet Priscilla could see through.

2

Reinhard: “Then, Felt-sama, I’ll go ahead and pay our respects at the inn. Since neither Flam nor Grassis is with us this time, please take care not to stand out too much.”

Seeing Reinhard off—who kept looking back over and over with a face like his heartstrings were being tugged—Felt let out a sigh.

It was her first time setting foot in this city. She understood his point about not drawing the wrong kind of attention, but—

Felt: “If he doesn’t want me standin’ out, he shouldn’t be tryin’ to stick me in clothes like this…”

Curling her lip, Felt muttered so; the outfit in question was a cute dress in vivid colors.

They had argued themselves hoarse over this sort of attire, and compared to before its gaudiness and the number of accessories had been reined in to a degree one could call restrained.

But, fundamentally, Felt did not want to be wearing a dress.

Felt: “Lately that guy’s dress offensive had cooled down, so I let my guard down. Give him the slightest opening and he’s the sort who wants to shove a dress on me.”

Pinching the hem of the skirt, Felt shrugged her shoulders with a “good grief.”

With nothing else to wear, she’d have to make do like this for a while, but meeting the other Royal Candidates for the first time in a while while dressed in a dress did not put her in the right headspace.

That kind of argument likely wouldn’t fly with Reinhard, though.

Anyway—

Felt: “So yeah, you lot’re comin’ along while I hunt for clothes. Once that’s done, you can do what you like for a bit.”

Gaston: “’Kay, got it.”

Camberley: “Ain’t like I mind you stayin’ in the dress, though. It ain’t like it looks as bad on you as you’re complainin’ it does.”

Hands on her hips, Felt looked back; answering her were two men at opposite extremes of size.

The big one was Gaston, the small one Camberley; both were Felt’s retainers.

In truth there was one more, a man named Rachins of a size between the two, but he had already been sent ahead to the inn to notify their arrival before Reinhard.

Reinhard had gone after that Rachins; Felt and the others, insisting they’d take in the sights of the Watergate City and then regroup, had in fact another true aim—as stated above, to change out of this dress and face the other Royal Candidates in clothing that made sense to Felt.

Therefore, leaving the readily nodding Gaston aside, Felt decided she couldn’t let Camberley, who seemed to have unnecessary opinions, slide; she leaned her face in close to his.

Camberley: “Wh-What, boss, your eyes’re scary.”

Felt: “It ain’t about whether it suits how I look or not—it’s about my heart. If it don’t suit my heart, I don’t care how pricey it is.”

Camberley: “That so? Any clothes’d rather be worn by a beauty woman than a plain one.”

Felt: “Shaddup. Don’t talk back.”

He kept pressing his case and got a kick in the butt for it; Camberley made a disgruntled face with a “what the hell.”

As it was, starting with Reinhard, there were plenty—Old Man

Rom, the manor maids Flam and Grassis—who tried to make Felt wear things she didn't like. If Camberley and the rest piled on, Felt would be left with no allies.

Gaston: "I'm with Felt on this. I get that a lot's gone down, but even so, you dressed all formal still looks off."

Camberley: "Ah! No fair! Boss, he's butterin' you up! I know this! Gaston promised to bring back souvenirs for his woman and kid, so he's hopin' for extra pocket money!"

Gaston: "Idiot, don't say extra crap! How 'bout you buy somethin' for your own woman for once!"

Camberley: "I get them to spoil me, so I don't gotta do that!"

Felt: "Zip it! Don't start some shameful squabble in the street!"

She wedged herself between the two who were about to grapple and pulled them apart.

If anything, Gaston's argument overwhelmingly had more merit, but if she declared a winner here, it might spiral into something messy, so she called it a draw.

Felt: "Anyway, we're short on time. If we take too long gettin' to the inn, that bastard Reinhard'll overthink it and swoop over here. Worst case, he drags me back to the inn as-is and parades me in front of Anastasia-neechan and the others in the dress."

Gaston: "So we split up and look for clothes and shoes and such, that it?"

Felt: "Yeah, that. Ah, clothes are whatever, but I'll pick out shoes that fit me myself."

Camberley: "Boss, boss, how much skin see-through's okay?"

Felt: "Tch, shoulda left you and kept Rachins instead."

She'd thought he was the better choice than the womanless Rachins, but she was on the verge of regretting that pick.

Felt: “All right, then it’s you I’m countin’ on, Gaston. Got it? Whether we get looked down on today or not—you best think the Royal Selection’s future’s ridin’ on it. Heavy’s the responsibility.”

Gaston: “Th-The Royal Selection’s future…”

Gulping, Gaston’s face grew stern under the weight that had just been set on both his shoulders. He had a scary mug that might make a child cry, and yet somewhere out there there was a baby who giggled for him—funny world.

Anyway, with that preface out of the way, Felt and the others broke into a run through the unfamiliar streets.

—And after each of them brought back what they’d been after, they regrouped.

Felt: “…There’s somethin’ I just can’t get behind here.”

Muttering so, Felt picked out what she liked from the clothes they’d gathered, slipped out of the fluttery, hard-to-move-in dress, and changed.

The design—sleek and easy to move in—even included a belt to fix a dagger in place. The look paired well enough with the boots Felt herself had chosen. She knew she wasn’t the type to fuss over appearances, but that didn’t mean she wanted to go out of her way to look mismatched.

On that point, the chosen clothes nailed Felt’s tastes and needs perfectly.

Felt: “’Cept it bugs me they’re all ones Camberley picked.”

Camberley: “Hey now, what, boss. You got a problem with clothes I picked?”

Felt: “Nah, no complaints… Kinda like “no complaints” is my complaint.”

Camberley: “What’s that even mean!”

Felt knew she was being unreasonable here, but it felt like she'd been the one forced to swallow unfairness first, so it was six of one, half a dozen of the other.

Leaving grumbling Camberley aside, Felt looked to the other one—the sad loser kneeling in the alley, Gaston.

Sadly, not a single one of the clothes Gaston had surely picked out in earnest had been adopted.

However—

Felt: "Sorry, but I ain't wearin' this polka-dot or this stripey one or these makes-no-sense clothes."

Gaston: "Huh?! Th-Th-That's goin' too far with "makes no sense," ain't it?! They're cute, ain't they!"

Felt: "Cute…"

It was a shame for the aghast-faced Gaston, but when it came to fashion, his sensibilities and Felt's did not align. She wouldn't say the clothes he picked weren't cute—but in that Felt didn't want to wear cute clothes, it was the same kind of forcing as Reinhard's.

Felt: "If you're pickin' souvenirs for Ilya and Kalifa, quit pickin' 'em alone. It grates, I know, but get Camberley to help you—best way to go."

Gaston: "U-Urgh…!"

Camberley: "Quit takin' it so hard! What d'you take me for!"

Watching Gaston press his fists to the ground and cry like a man, Camberley complained so.

At his pitiful state, Felt thought a moment, then fixed on one thing from what Gaston had chosen—a blue neck-wrap—and swiftly wound just that around her neck. It was pretty long; the tip almost brushed the ground, but it wasn't a bad match.

Felt: "This ain't bad. Right, let's call it complete with this."

Gaston: “F-Felt…!”

Felt: “You look way too saved over one neck-wrap… geez.”

Gaston teared up, relieved that at least the neck-wrap had been adopted and his effort not rendered entirely void. After giving the giant’s shoulder some hearty slaps without restraint, Felt turned back toward the street with a “right then.”

Outfit changed, battle-readied and solid. —All that remained was whether the other Royal Candidates would be braced in kind to match her mindset.

Felt: “Well, judgin’ by how they’ve lived this past year, I don’t gotta worry ’bout that. Every last one of ’em’s livin’ strong enough to make you sick of it.”

While Felt’s side had focused on laying the groundwork, the other Royal Candidates—headed by Anastasia—had steadily advanced their preparations for the Royal Selection, as was widely known. Even so, Felt had no intention of losing once she was in it.

Not even at this gathering Anastasia had set up did her pugnacity plan to yield an inch.

Just, it wasn’t like she only wanted those crash-bang head-on collisions.

Felt: “Since the half-elf chick’s comin’ too, for once I wanna swap war stories ’bout bein’ made to do stuff that don’t suit us.”

After all, thinking back, she and Emilia were comrades who had butted heads in Old Man Rom’s loot house.

By the odd turns of fate that followed, they were both in the inescapable position of Royal Candidates, but unlike the others, Felt and Emilia, in the sense they’d started from having nothing, could be said to have begun looking at things from the same eye level.

Of course, the bitter draughts a slum girl and a silver-haired half-elf had tasted were surely very different.

Even so, there ought to be things they could set themselves down and talk about at length.

Felt: “Good grief, we’re dancin’ right to Anastasia-neechan’s tune.”

Realizing she’d been nicely put in the mood before she knew it, Felt gave a wry smile.

And just then—

Rachins: “—Tch. So this’s where you were. Been lookin’ for ya.”

Cursing as he said it, the punk—no, Rachins—ran up to where Felt and the others were in the alley. At his appearance, Felt raised an eyebrow with an “oh,” and Rachins, with those sharp sanpaku eyes, raked Felt up and down with a long look,

Rachins: “Hah. Figures—that’s why. The naggin’ from Reinhard’s gonna get loud again, ain’t it?”

Felt: “Say what he wants, if the goods ain’t here it’s our win. He ain’t keen on showin’ the other camps a front with our steps outta sync, either.”

Rachins: “That so. Anyway, the guy says get to the inn already. The other camps’re showin’ up one after another.”

Seeing through at a glance that “Watergate City sightseeing” had been a pretext, Rachins relayed that to Felt.

With the other camps arriving and Felt changed, they’d made it just in time; baring a fang in a grin, Felt clicked her tongue and steeled herself.

Felt: “Right, I’m off. If that dress’s still around, Reinhard’s liable to yap about changin’, so sell it. You can keep the proceeds. We’re at a place called the Water Plumage Inn, so if somethin’ comes up, head there.”

Rachins: “Yeah, yeah.”

Gaston: “Oh, got it.”

Camberley: “I’m gonna go have some fun!”

Shrugging at their three-as-they-please replies, Felt stepped out from the alley into the streets.

All told, she thought anew that doing the sightseeing she’d used as a pretext might not be so bad—the city was that pretty.

3

Crusch: “What a beautiful cityscape.”

Ferris: “—. Yes, it is. We’re blessed with fine weather too; it’s the perfect day for an outing, nya~”

Hearing Ferris answer while gazing at the same view, Crusch let out a small breath of admiration.

Sensing the brief hesitation before his reply, Crusch narrowed her amber eyes ever so slightly.

It seemed she had put her foot in her mouth yet again. Most likely, this was not Crusch’s first time visiting the city. —Regrettably, nowhere in her memory could she find when that had been, or what sort of memories she had of it.

Even at a time like this, the Divine Protection of Wind Reading Crusch had been granted worked in full, and she picked up the pained, desolate wind Ferris could not quite conceal no matter how he tried.

To the knight closest to her, most devoted to her, who thought of her more than anyone—Ferris in that position—she felt a mortification at making him taste that sensation again and again.

Over the last year, in all the places Crusch had gone with Ferris at her side, she had been freshly confronted time and again with the footprints of “Valkyrie” Crusch Karsten.

Crusch: “No—this is not limited to Ferris.”

In the sense of disappointing someone, she had probably made everyone who knew the former her taste it. If they had thrown disappointment and discouragement at her head-on, that would still be something; as it was, Crusch was merely sensing them on her own with the power of her Divine Protection.

There was no way she could put on the face of the victim; the bitterness only piled up inside.

Crusch: “Wilhelm, have you been to Priestella before?”

Before her sunken mood could show on her face, Crusch addressed Wilhelm, who was acting as coachman. The loyal retainer held the reins and, within a city whose roads were laid out intricately around its waterways, deftly directed the ground dragon along their route as he said,

Wilhelm: “Several times before. Though that was more than twenty years ago now. The cityscape has not changed in any major way, but there do seem to be small differences from my memories.”

Crusch: “More than twenty years… Was that when you were a Royal Knight?”

Wilhelm: “Yes. Several times on knightly duties. …And twice, I came on a trip with my wife.”

Crusch: “With your lady wife.”

It was not the first time she had heard, from the affectionate Wilhelm’s own mouth, memories of his wife.

Though he was not especially talkative by nature, when it came to his lady wife he spoke with a smoothness that was precisely for that subject.

It made her smile to hear that this Watergate City held such memories too.

Ferris: “Heeh, Wil-ji going on a trip with his wife, nya~. Even though you’re now Captain of the Royal Guard, you still had that much loose time back then?”

Wilhelm: “I was not the Captain of the Royal Guard since my youth, and even after becoming captain, I was not always buried in work. If I came home late on an anniversary or on a promised early-return day, Theresia would grow displeased.”

Ferris: “Ahh, a great domestic war. In that case the odds were against you, Wil-ji.”

Wilhelm: “Quite. I loved my wife, you see. And the reverse was likewise.”

Seated on the coachman’s box, Wilhelm faced forward; from the passenger compartment Crusch could not see his face.

Even so, she could picture Wilhelm wearing a gentle expression and lips as he spoke of his memories.

She frankly thought it enviable. —On occasion, even when someone told her about memories she did not know, Crusch could not feel them as her own. The unbridgeable gap born between the former her and the present her was a symbol of pain to Crusch.

Ferris: “Okay, okay, thanks for the treat! …But times were kinder in Wil-ji’s day, huh. Or is Captain Marcos just bad at work style, nya?”

Crusch: “Marcos Gildark?”

Ferris: “When the captain was young, you were still Captain of the Royal Guard too, right, Wil-ji?”

Wilhelm: “Indeed. To be honest, he possessed outstanding ability from his days as a recruit. He is stronger now than ever… to the point that even I in my prime might not be able to match him.”

Ferris: “But you in your prime were a powerhouse who defeated your wife, the then-Sword Saint… In that case, you’re saying Marcos-sama surpasses the Sword Saint of that time?”

Wilhelm: “—. Quite. Then allow me to rephrase: he does not measure up to me in my prime.”

Ferris: “Puh. What’s with that, nya?”

Ferris couldn’t help but snort at how Wilhelm flipped his opinion in a huff. Crusch, too, put a hand to her lips and tittered.

The way he could overturn his own statement the moment his wife’s renown, rather than his own, might be called into question told how great a share his love for his wife held inside Wilhelm.

For one to be loved so much, she must have been a truly wonderful woman. Regardless of memory or no, Crusch felt keenly that she would have liked to meet her at least once.

Just then, when Crusch was holding such sentiment—

Wilhelm: “Matters of the past may be allowed to remain that hazy. What is important is not to remember the particulars and be able to speak of them, but that the core within those memories remains unshaken.”

Crusch: “Wilhelm?”

Wilhelm: “At times, that may give rise to pain. Yet in many cases, what one truly desires is hidden precisely beyond that pain. It is a presumptuous opinion, but…”

Quiet words, spoken even as if hesitant to say them, that Crusch could tell—by her Divine Protection’s power—no, even without it—were addressed to her. And they were unmistakably a golden saying meant for Crusch, who bore an unceasing pain in her breast.

Crusch: “…”

After a beat, Crusch set a hand to her chest and took a deep breath.

Contrary to expectation, her heart was not racing. It felt as though only her heart was flustered, while her body sat solidly, waiting for it to settle.

Crusch: “Ferris, it seems you and I have visited Priestella before. Would you tell me about that time?”

Before the flower of courage she had been given could wilt and wither, Crusch asked Ferris thus.

At that question, Ferris's eyes went perfectly round in surprise. Then his gaze turned to the back of Wilhelm's head—no doubt because he realized it was Wilhelm who had given Crusch the push.

Ferris: "U-Um, about that time…"

After glaring at Wilhelm's head for a while, Ferris dropped his eyes and trailed off.

It had been about a year since her "Memories" were lost; Crusch had been rebuilding all sorts of things, and among those she had been with Ferris the whole time. She knew this reaction of his was not awkwardness or aversion, but consideration not to hurt Crusch.

That thoughtfulness of his made her happy. It did—but—

Crusch: "Ferris, I'm asking of my own accord. Even if those memories might hurt me, I'm prepared for that."

Ferris: "U… but, you see? Ferri-chan doesn't want you to be hurt."

Crusch: "Quite so. You are, surely, kinder than anyone else in this world, so it's only natural you'd want to stop me when I seem intent on hurting myself. However—"

Ferris: "Crusch-sama?"

Crusch: "I have exactly one certainty. Not a certainty that I won't be hurt, but a certainty that even if I am hurt, when that happens you—Ferris—will be by my side."

At Crusch's firm declaration, Ferris lifted the face he had lowered and blinked wide. Smiling softly at his adorable reaction, Crusch gave a quiet nod in return.

Ferris, called "Blue," the foremost practitioner of healing magic in the kingdom—if he was at her side, bodily wounds would be healed in an instant. And, limited to Crusch, the wounds of her heart would surely be healed as well.

The existence of the knight Felix Argyle—Ferris—was that great a thing to Crusch Karsten, regardless of whether she had "Memories" or not.

Crusch: “So please, tell me. The memories that existed between you and me.”

Ferris: “… It’s not only between Ferri-chan and Crusch-sama.”

As if to reason with her, Crusch had conveyed it gently; at last Ferris opened his mouth.

Her reply was something Crusch had not imagined, but no wind blew from Ferris that suggested he meant to equivocate here or to conceal the truth.

Always until now, Ferris had tried to be earnest and sincere toward Crusch. That same wind—no, an even stronger true wind—blew from him now.

Crusch and Ferris—and some “other” besides the two of them—.

Ferris: “—Fourier Lugunica.”

Crusch: “…”

Ferris: “His Highness Fourier Lugunica, Crusch-sama.”

Timidly, Ferris spoke the name once, then again with an honorific. The intensity of attachment in his tone was not something easy to put into simple words.

The winds of emotion that the Divine Protection of Wind Reading could sense came in many colors and directions; among them, Crusch regarded the one easiest to receive as that person’s strongest feeling.

Yet at this moment, the wind overflowing from Ferris was so intermingled with joy and sorrow that she could not declare which one was foremost.

If she had to name the source of this wind, she could only say this:

Crusch: “—A wind of love.”

Ferris: "…"

Crusch: "Ferris, you loved this His Highness Fourier, didn't you."

Ferris: "…ah."

So, from the "love" that washed over her body, Crusch read Ferris's feelings for the other. At her words, Ferris let out a ragged breath and his eyes grew moist.

Tears welled round in his eyes; he hastily wiped them with the back of his hand, worked his lips to speak, failed time and again, and then—

Ferris: "Yes. —And so did you, Crusch-sama."

Crusch: "…I see."

It dawned on her that this had been the reason that had weighed heaviest on Ferris's tongue.

At Ferris's gaze, full to the point of pain with poignant sorrow, a thorn quietly pricked Crusch's heart. There was a seeping ache—and the fact that it was only to that extent tormented Crusch terribly.

Surely, what Ferris had least wanted to see was Crusch's heart hurting in this way.

Crusch: "…"

Even when she spoke the name "Fourier Lugunica," there was no stab of pain in Crusch's breast.

The pain Crusch felt was only for the desolation of being unable to recall things related to that name, and for Ferris's reaction upon beholding that fact.

Though the one bearing that name was someone dear to the memories Crusch and Ferris shared. Though she knew what had become of a person bearing the name of Lugunica and called "His Highness."

But precisely because she didn’t fully know, she wanted to know.

Crusch: “Please tell me, Ferris. About His Highness Fourier. —About the person who was loved by me and you, and surely by many others besides.”

Ferris: “…It’s going to be really, really, reaaally long, you know?”

Perhaps she had expected to be told “I’m sorry” there.

Ferris’s eyes widened as though Crusch’s next words had been unexpected, and then, shyly, as if to test her resolve, he said so.

By now the carriage had been inside the Watergate City for a while; she supposed they would arrive before long at their destination, the Water Plumage Inn—but—

Crusch: “Wilhelm.”

Wilhelm: “…As you wish.”

Without needing her to say it all, the retainer who took her meaning ordered the ground dragon to turn down a road along the waterway. If he had caught Crusch’s intent, it would be a route different from the one leading straight to the inn.

That gave them a little more time.

Crusch: “If he was that important to us, I don’t expect you can tell me everything… but—”

Ferris: “…That’s right. Really, really, once Ferri-chan starts talkin’ there’s no end to it—such a troublesome, troublesome person he was.”

With eyebrows drooping, Ferris seemed to resign himself—but not in a despairing way; rather, like someone groping to draw close something precious far away, unsure where to begin, he murmured.

Gently, Crusch overlaid her hand atop Ferris’s and waited for his words.

For the telling of memories that the former her had surely had at her core, which the present her did not know.

—So she could hear the beloved “The Dream the Lion King Saw,” amid the murmuring of water.

4

Julius: “Anastasia-sama, it seems they’re arriving one after another.”

Anastasia: “Well now, right on schedule—how excellent. Sounds like nothin’ unexpected happened on the road either, so from the host’s side we’ve got well-mannered guests and that’s a big help.”

In a room at the inn, Anastasia, who’d been looking out at the waterway scenery from the veranda, gave a long, luxurious stretch at Julius’s report as he came to stand beside her.

The way every camp had arranged their itineraries to make the appointed date and time—now that was skillful.

Anastasia: “We went and lined up cooks and ingredients to match today, after all; I’m relieved it looks like none of that’ll go to waste.”

Julius: “Indeed. Beyond the beauty of the Watergate City itself, once they lay eyes on this Water Plumage Inn, I expect everyone will be duly astonished.”

Anastasia: “Oh? That what you’ve got your eye on most, Julius? If so, you’ve got quite the nice personality.”

Julius: “A nice personality…? That doesn’t sound like it’s purely praise.”

Smiling with a cat-like grin and peeking into his face, Anastasia drew a wry smile from Julius. At her knight’s reaction, Anastasia tapped the veranda floor with her hand, knock-knock,

Anastasia: “Ain’t that right? Our “Finest of Knights” here bein’ all eager—“Can’t wait to see everyone’s faces when this unusual inn surprises ’em”—now that’s real lively and fun, ain’t it.”

Julius: “You said much the same the first time you showed me this inn, the other day.”

Anastasia: “Uh-huh. So? From the eyes of the first one who got surprised, you think the rest’ll be surprised too?”

Julius: “On that point, I believe your preparations leave no gaps and no grounds for complaint.”

With a hand to his chest, Julius—rarely—shaped a mischievous smile. Seeing that, Anastasia let her brows drop in satisfied delight with a “heh,”

Anastasia: “My, my, you’re in a truly good mood.”

Julius: “It’s true I’m excited. Thinking back, I seldom… turned my wits toward things like this—schemes to surprise or please someone. However, Anastasia-sama—”

Anastasia: “What is it?”

Julius: “Contrary to appearances, even I had a mischievous streak in my younger days, before I aspired to knighthood.”

At that sudden—no, amusing—confession, Anastasia’s eyes went round.

If it was before he’d aspired to be a knight, then unless what she’d heard in passing was wrong, it would be when he was still single-digits in age. Anastasia couldn’t even picture Julius at that age.

All the same, the words “Julius Juukulius” and “mischievous” had a gulf between them far too wide.

Anastasia: “Heh heh, mischievous… You were mischievous? Now that’s a surprise.”

Julius: “So please, be at ease. Unexpected as it may be, I don’t dislike such things as this.”

Anastasia: "You say stuff like that, and it makes me wanna plan things like this again—'course, that's if this time goes well."

Hearing Julius's confession, Anastasia laughed with a hand to her mouth.

Honestly, it wasn't a bad notion. —In planning this gathering, and also for the sake of winning the Royal Selection, Anastasia had kept eyes and ears on the other camps' moves and circumstances. As a result, what she found herself thinking was the simple fact that she couldn't bring herself to dislike any of the other candidates.

They were rival candidates. With only one able to become king, wins and losses would surely arise. That didn't mean it was a matter of life and death. Nor that they could never speak again.

Perhaps only after the Royal Selection ended would the candidates, at long last, be able to strip away the needless entanglements and talk heart-to-heart.

Julius: "—Anastasia-sama, it's about time."

Anastasia: "Mm, that so."

Lost in thought, Anastasia raised her face at Julius's call. She took the hand her knight held out as he rose first, and slowly lifted herself from the veranda.

With a soft flutter, her light-purple hair streamed in the passing breeze; Anastasia once more gave a long stretch right there, then whirled around with verve.

With Julius in tow, she headed to the inn's entrance—the welcoming of the invited guests.

Sliding open the side-opening doors, she smiled and called out to the assembled faces marveling at the Water Plumage Inn.

Anastasia: "—Looks like we got ourselves some surprised folks. In that case, pickin' this place was worth it, wasn't it."

Chapter 3:
The Day of Arrival: Nighttime

1

On the night when the camps of the invited Royal Selection candidates were all gathered at the Water Plumage Inn.

The face-to-face meetings between the camps, given as the pretext, were postponed until tomorrow, and they were being treated to a welcome unique to a Wafuu inn—something rare even in Priestella.

That welcome was—

Emilia: “W-Wow, that’s a reaaally big bath!”

Beatrice: “Good grief, don’t get too carried away, Emilia. Betty was entrusted by Subaru to make sure you don’t embarrass yourself where others can see, I suppose—eeek?!”

Emilia: “Kyaa! Beatrice?!”

A high-pitched scream flipped over, and the next moment a great splash echoed across the open-air bath.

Apparently, one of the lively guests—the girl with the tightly curled hair, Beatrice—had slipped and tumbled into the tub.

Beatrice: “Blub blub blub, in fact…”

Emilia: “Honestly, Beatrice… If you rush that much, it’s dangerous. You mustn’t get too excited, all right? Subaru asked me properly, too.”

Beatrice: “Th-The very same request—what’s the meaning of that, I suppose… Betty and Emilia alike have been carelessly caught in Subaru’s scheme, in fact…!”

Raising her head from where she’d sunk into the bath, Beatrice trembled as Emilia tilted her head.

She didn't seem to get it, but Subaru's stratagem—ordering both Emilia and Beatrice to keep an eye on each other—wasn't half bad. One could also say he'd gotten used to handling the two when things turned into a situation like this.

Felt: "Tch—yeah, this is huge! No wonder the inn shows it off."

Crusch: "Indeed, truly so. I had heard as much, yet… to think the bath is outside is surprising."

A bit later than Emilia and Beatrice, Felt and Crusch came to the open-air bath as well. With towels wrapped around their bodies, they each took in the unusual bath with wonder.

Together with the way Emilia and Beatrice were frolicking, it was a reaction well worth the effort of hospitality.

Anastasia: "Heh-Heh—nice, ain't it? Even in Kararagi ya hardly ever see an open-air bath this big, y'know? The Wafuu buildin's and the food, and this open-air bath to boot—that there's the true charm o' the Water Plumage Inn."

Pleased by everyone's reactions, Anastasia—also in a bath towel—puffed out her chest.

The eye-catching buildings and the rich array of dishes were sights in themselves, but what Anastasia liked most about this inn, by far, was this hot spring.

As Crusch had been surprised to hear, the very idea of building a bath out under the open sky was the brainchild of none other than Kararagi's founding hero, Hoshin of the Wilderness. For Anastasia, who bore the Hoshin name not by blood but as the heir to his will, it was a point of great pride.

Anastasia: "Truth is, one o' my hobbies is hoppin' from hot spring to hot spring. On that front, it's a shame ya don't hear many rumors 'bout hot springs or hidden retreats in Lugunica."

Emilia: "Hidden retreats?"

Anastasia: "Means a secret hot spring. Out in the mountains, or beside a big river or lake—in places folks can't easily get to; like phantom baths, y'know."

At the unfamiliar word, Emilia tilted her head with a question mark; Anastasia lifted a finger and lectured. Listening beside them, Felt nodded with an impressed "Heh," and—

Felt: "Sure, dunkin' yourself head to toe feels great. These days I get a bath every day at Reinhard's place, but before that—'less we borrowed a bath at a brothel now 'n then—we mostly made do with a wash-off… Freezin' days were hell."

Emilia: "Ah, me too, me too. There was a river in the forest, but the forest always had snow piled up, so the water was reaaally cold and made me all tingly."

Crusch: "…You two truly had it hard, it seems."

Felt and Emilia spoke, a touch pensive, from an angle slightly different from what Anastasia had hoped to boast about. At those tidbits, Crusch kept flicking glances toward Anastasia, eyes asking for help on how to match the tone.

Unfortunately for Crusch, Anastasia had also been born and raised in one of Kararagi's worst slums. Until she'd been picked up by Ricardo at around eight, she prided herself on a life no less harsh than Felt's in the capital's back-alleys.

So, in her heart, she was on Felt and Emilia's side—hardly what one expects of a Royal Candidate.

Beatrice: "No need to let it weigh on you. It's simply that each person has a history, I suppose. It only means you had no need to endure that sort of hardship; there's no reason to feel abashed, in fact."

Crusch: "Beatrice-sama…!"

Hauling herself up from the bath she'd unexpectedly fallen into, Beatrice wrung out her wet hair. At her words, Crusch pressed a hand to her chest in relief.

With Crusch seemingly reassured, Anastasia clapped her hands.

Anastasia: “All right now—Beatrice-chan got ahead of herself a mite, but there’s proper manner for an open-air bath. Don’t dip yer towel in the tub, ’n make sure ya tie up yer hair.”

Beatrice: “B-Betty didn’t get ahead of herself; it’s this slippery floor that’s at fault, in fact! Besides, Betty’s body is made of mana, so with a snap she can recompose it and she’s not dirty, I suppose!”

Felt: “Hah, handy trick. But a bath ain’t just ’bout washin’ off the dirt.”

Emilia: “Right. Feeling all toasty-warm is so nice, I always end up soaking way too long.”

Anastasia: “Mm-hm, sounds like Felt ’n Emilia both’ve got the proper mindset for enjoyin’ a hot spring—good to hear. In that case…”

Judging Felt and Emilia ready to face the hot spring properly, Anastasia turned her gaze to Crusch. Through the bath towel one could tell her body’s elegant curves; at that, she stiffened her cheeks.

Crusch: “A-Anastasia-sama?”

Anastasia: “First ya wash yourself at the wash-place, then ya sink in nice ’n easy! Us long-haired gals can be pals together, y’hear?”

Crusch: “No, thank you; I can attend to myself…”

Anastasia: “Now, now, don’t say that. Mimi usually comes with me, but looks like she’s been runnin’ ’round playin’ with that Garfiel-kun, so I’m lonely all by my lonesome.”

Taking Crusch by the hand, Anastasia led her off to the wash-place.

Of course, if Crusch truly resisted in earnest, Anastasia’s slender arms wouldn’t stand a chance. The very fact she was being firmly escorted meant it wasn’t real resistance.

Emilia: “Then, Beatrice, let’s wash each other, too. How ’bout you, Felt-chan?”

Felt: “I’m good—don’t need in on that. As ya can see, unlike you ladies I keep my hair short. Ain’t much work to wash a—hey, what, shorty?”

Beatrice: “Don’t be so shy, in fact. Betty and Emilia will scrub you from the top of your head to your bottom, I suppose! Emilia!”

Emilia: “Mm-hm! We’ll get you squeaky-clean!”

Felt: “Whoah! Quit—cut it out! Hiss-ss!!”

While Anastasia marched Crusch to the wash-place, Felt let out a catlike cry as Emilia and Beatrice grabbed her and slathered her in suds. Over there, too, the noisy rough-and-tumble was in full swing—very fine indeed.

Anastasia: “So? If yer fixin’ to slip away from my hands, I’ll just leave ya to Emilia-san ’n the others.”

Crusch: “…Understood. I yield. You truly are dreadful.”

Sparing a sidelong glance at what Felt was being put through, Crusch slumped her shoulders in total surrender.

Anastasia soaped her back and then set to washing Crusch’s long, beautiful green hair.

Soaked with plenty of water, it showed a breathtaking peak of gloss and freshness. Not a single strand looked damaged; the sight all but drew out a sigh.

Thinking of her own slightly wavy hair, it made her greedy enough to wish they could trade.

Anastasia: “All that’s the fruit of your own effort, Crusch-san… hmm, or maybe there’s a real good chance it’s Ferris-san’s hard work, too.”

Crusch: “What is it? Did you just mention Ferris?”

Anastasia: “Mm~. Truth is, when I said we’d be takin’ a hot spring bath, I got a teensy bit fluttery wonderin’ which one Ferris-san’d go in—boys’ or girls’. I was thinkin’ maybe he’s always together with you, Crusch-san.”

Crusch: “N-No! Ferris is indeed most adorable, but he is a man.”

Though Ferris spread charm fitting his cute looks, just as Crusch said, his way of thinking and moving a conversation along left an unexpectedly masculine impression.

That said, there had to be meaning in Ferris consciously sticking to that outfit and that manner. While it was one thing for an onlooker like Anastasia to wonder, she’d been curious how the parties themselves—Crusch and company—regarded it.

Anastasia: “So you treat Ferris-san as a boy in how ya deal with him, huh.”

Crusch: “—? Yes, that is my intention.”

Anastasia: “Uh-huh. …Feels like there’s just a li’l mismatch there, though.”

Crusch: “Eh?”

Murmured under her breath, Anastasia’s aside didn’t reach Crusch’s ears. When asked back, Anastasia answered, “Nothin’, nothin’.” Then she focused on washing Crusch’s hair. Looking a little perplexed, Crusch did not press further.

Instead—

Felt: “Huh? Reinhard roughed up one of your folks, neechan?”

From the neighboring wash-place, where she was buried in suds, came that startled voice.

At Felt’s surprise, Emilia—still not stopping her hands—gave a wry smile.

Emilia: “Um, it’s not like he “roughed him up.” It’s just, y’know, when you first meet Reinhard he's got this… very slightly surprising aura, right? And then, our Garfiel seems to've gotten surprised by it…"

Beatrice: "He went "grr" and swung at him, 'n got cleanly countered for his troubles, in fact."

Emilia: "He was not beaten! …But it looks like he took it reaaally hard."

At the name Garfiel, Anastasia pricked up her ears, too.

Ever since she'd gone as a messenger to the Emilia camp, Mimi had been fixated on that boy named Garfiel. The one paling most over it was her kid brother Hetaro, but Anastasia, too, bore responsibility as their guardian.

Even aside from that, to Anastasia, Mimi was like a dear little sister. Not quite a daughter—she wasn't at that age yet.

Leaving Anastasia's self-recognition aside, Felt—now completely resigned to being double-teamed at the wash-place—rested her cheek on her knee and said,

Felt: "Kinda seein' the whole scene in my head… Betcha it went like this: that guy—Reinhard—took this Garfiel's sword or fist with a grin, 'n then went, "A splendid display," or some crap like that 'n rubbed him all raw, yeah?"

Emilia: "Felt-chan, amazing…"

Beatrice: "Almost like you were right there watchin', I suppose."

Felt: "Bang on the nose, huh. That guy never learns a damn thing…"

With an exaggerated sigh, Felt brooded over the dust-up between Reinhard and Garfiel. At that, Emilia went "Heave-ho," poured warm water over Felt's head, and rinsed off the foam. Felt shook her head and body, reacting exactly like a cat who hates being soaked to the skin.

Felt: “All right, you asked for it, neechan. ’Kay then, I’ll get you back.”

Emilia: “Oh, will you switch with me? Thank you sooo much. My hair’s long and it’s a lot to wash, so having help is a huge help.”

Felt: “If it’s long and a pain, just cut it off already.”

Emilia: “But Puck and Subaru both tell me long hair suits me better.”

Beatrice: “Betty agrees with Subaru and Nii-cha, in fact. Emilia’s long, pretty silver hair is worth swallowin’ a bit of trouble for, I suppose.”

Felt: “Yeah, yeah!”

Wearing the look of someone who’d poked a wasp’s nest, Felt answered Emilia and Beatrice with studied carelessness.

Because they were always holding hands, it tended to be the closeness between Subaru and Beatrice that stood out, but seeing them like this, the bond between Emilia and Beatrice was something, too. Like sisters—though which one was the older and which the younger was a matter for debate.

Crusch: “Anastasia-sama, if you like, shall we switch?”

Anastasia: “Ah, right. I’ll leave it to ya.”

Unlike the raucous trio over there, they finished scrubbing properly and thoroughly, and Anastasia and Crusch swapped offense and defense. Changing places, Anastasia undid her towel and bared her back.

Between Royal Candidates—one could say she was baring her back defenselessly to a political rival—but—

Anastasia: “—Crusch-san? What’s the matter?”

At Crusch, who’d fallen silent, Anastasia felt something off and turned just her head. With her hair tied up, Crusch narrowed her amber eyes and shook her head.

Crusch: “No, only… that Anastasia-sama’s hair is as fine and soft as a cat’s fur, and I find myself envious.”

Anastasia: “—Pfft.”

Crusch: “A-Ah? Why laugh? Did I say something strange?”

Anastasia: “Nah, nah, not that… Ahh, that’s rich.”

Unable to help it, Anastasia chewed back the laughter rising in her throat; Crusch blinked in confusion, eyes going round. At that wholly womanly reaction from Crusch, Anastasia shook her head.

Anastasia: ““The farther the star, the brighter it seems.” Hoshin’s sayings.”

Crusch: “—That is to say?”

Anastasia: “Means we’re both wishin’ for what the other’s got. Haah, settin’ up this lil’ meetin’ was the right call.”

Crusch: “…I cannot say I understand the reason behind your conviction just now, but on the thought itself I agree. I’ve been given a most meaningful time.”

Anastasia: “Right?”

Answering that crisp reply with a crisp grin, Anastasia and Crusch shared a laugh.

At the wash-place beside them, the combined onslaught of Emilia and Felt finally descended upon Beatrice, and the ruckus was lively indeed—their cheerful voices carried high, high up into the roofless sky.

This, Anastasia thought, was why open-air baths were so addictive.

2

Ferris: “Fyaa~ I feel revived~”

Letting the cat ears atop his head go all limp, Ferris stretched out his arms and legs as he soaked in the tub.

Ferris favored big, emotional turns of phrase about everything, but the satisfaction of sinking his whole body into a hot spring was no exaggeration—so Julius, soaking beside him, also felt.

For this gathering, Anastasia's camp were the ones who'd done the inviting. Naturally, they'd arrived in Priestella earlier than the others and had checked the Water Plumage Inn beforehand. However, though they'd verified with their own eyes the Wafuu buildings and the rooms' interiors, the actual stay had been postponed until tonight by Anastasia's arrangement.

Anastasia: "'Since it's a rare treat, Julius, ya wanna enjoy it the same as everyone else, right?'"

So had Anastasia mischievously proposed, and savoring the true intent behind it, he was once again struck by what a remarkable lady she was.

Reinhard: "Indeed—just as Ferris says, it feels like vigor wells up all the way to your fingertips and toes."

As if putting Julius's thoughts into words, Reinhard—soaking in the same bath—laughed. At his words, Ferris rested his upper body against the rim and went, "Right, right~", then—

Ferris: "Nya, a hot spring isn't just a big bath, y'know. It's like… the special goodness of a bath you sink into after field training with the Knights, or something."

Julius: "Ah, but I think I know what you mean. A bath after training has a different flavor entirely."

Ferris: "See, see~… and yet, Reinhard, you always handle it with that cool face of yours!"

Julius: "If you're going to say that, Ferris, your post in field training is mainly the treatment team… The intensity of the training assigned to you should be quite different from mine and Reinhard's, no?"

Ferris: “Don’t say extra stuff! Julius, whose side are you on?”

Julius: “If I had to say, we should call it that we’re all on different “camps,” I think.”

Ferris puffed his cheeks at Julius’s shoulder-lifted reply. Seeing that, Julius met Reinhard’s eyes and, a beat later, they both let out a small chuckle.

For all that hot springs were said to be a culture originating in the Kararagi City-States, he thought with feeling how curious and fascinating a thing they were.

The capital’s drill grounds had facilities for washing off sweat, and it wasn’t unusual for manors to have bathhouses for bathing, too—but this was the first time he’d ever soaked in the same bath as Reinhard and Ferris.

Why, during field training they might bathe in rivers or lakes—but—

Julius: “Even in places like that, the knights around me are often considerate.”

Ferris: “Well, Ferri-chan and Julius can at least produce water by ourselves, nya. Speaking of, what do you do at times like that, Reinhard?”

Reinhard: ““What do I do,” well… I just bathe with everyone else like normal, but…”

Ferris: “Heh~ bet everyone’s all tense, nya.”

Julius hadn’t known those particulars about Reinhard either, and hearing that, Ferris let slip a very pointed impression. Julius worried it might be a touch too direct, but Reinhard folded his arms in the hot water and said,

Reinhard: “It’s true. If I could, I’d like to get along better with everyone in the Knights, but it’s not so easy. I am trying, though. I’ve been using Captain Marcos as a reference, and…”

Ferris: “Ahh, there’s your problem laid bare in one go. The Captain makes folks as tense as you do—if not more.”

Julius: “The Captain? That is…”

At Ferris’s exasperation, Reinhard looked as surprised as if it had never occurred to him. Still wearing that surprised face, his blue eyes turned Julius’s way, and Julius nodded.

Julius: “We both—Ferris and I—find your and the Captain’s personalities admirable… but it’s a fact that your titles and prowess put pressure on those around you.”

Reinhard: “Oof… I see. I’m beaten. I did kinda suspect as much.”

Ferris: ““Kinda” won’t cut it. How many years you been Reinhard now?”

Reinhard: “Harsh.”

With Ferris’s characteristically sharp tongue, Reinhard gave a wry smile and scratched his cheek with a finger.

There was no bite to the barb precisely because it was so straightforward as to leave no room for misunderstanding. Even if it had been about himself and not Reinhard, the crispness would have won out. If Ferris hadn’t been here, Julius would surely have answered Reinhard in some roundabout way—so he was glad Ferris was.

Of course, Ferris, too, stood in the Royal Guard as someone singled out—for different reasons than Reinhard—so how he was seen by those around him could hardly be someone else’s problem.

Perhaps thinking the same as Julius—“in that case,” Reinhard looked over at Ferris, who was relaxing limply against the rim of the hot spring.

Reinhard: “What about you, Ferris? What do you keep in mind?”

Ferris: “Ferri-chan’s way? If you seriously wanna walk the same path as Ferri-chan, the first step would be to draw out the little girl inside Reinhard, okay?”

Reinhard: ““Little girl inside me”… I wonder if there is one?”

Ferris: “Well, to a greater or lesser degree, everyone’s got a part like tha— ow.”

Julius: “Now, now, don’t tease Reinhard like that.”

Ferris had been about to toss out a quip with a mischievous look; Julius pinched the toes of the foot he’d stretched out in the water to give him a mild scolding, then glanced Reinhard’s way.

Julius: “That said, Ferris’s charm isn’t something easily imitated by others. Jokes aside, as a reference it might be a bit off the mark.”

Reinhard: “I see. In that case, perhaps the one I ought to take as reference is Subaru.”

Julius & Ferris: “Hah?”

Before they knew it, that slipped out of both Julius and Ferris at once.

Julius wondered if this was petty revenge for Ferris’s earlier joke, but Reinhard looked far too serious for that.

Reinhard: “Subaru’s good at getting along with the people around him, right? In fact, he succeeded in negotiating with Crusch-sama and Anastasia-sama, and we managed to stand against the White Whale and the Witch Cult’s clutches.”

Ferris: “That’s… well, if you only look at the results, that’s true, nya.”

Julius: “…In his case, the road getting there was rather rough, though, wasn’t it?”

Reinhard: “Everyone makes mistakes. Thinking back, I first met Subaru in the royal capital on a day off, but even at first meeting he was very composed.”

Ferris: “Isn’t that just a matter of being thick-skinned or brazen…?”

Julius weighed his words; Ferris chose his in his own way. On the whole, Julius agreed with Ferris—but Reinhard nodded, looking satisfied, and said,

Reinhard: “I mean that mental strength, perhaps. I think Subaru’s is exceptional. I’m confident I’m above Subaru in physical strength, but… it’s undoubtedly a rare quality.”

Ferris: “Mmm, I think you’re appraising him a bit too kindly. We’re talking about Subaru-kyun, you know?”

Julius: “—No, I feel like I understand Reinhard’s view.”

Ferris: “Eh?! Betrayal?!”

At Julius’s single line, Ferris’s cat ears stood up and his eyes flew wide. “Betrayal” was overstating it, but there were, in fact, parts where he agreed with Reinhard.

—That Subaru’s mental side, his extraordinary strength of will, had many points worth emulating.

Julius: “Granted, as a knight in skill and conduct, he has far, far too many shortcomings.”

Ferris: “Phew, thank goodness~. Geez, I thought you’d suddenly stabbed Ferri-chan in the back.”

Julius: “But the fact you don’t object means you acknowledge that point as well, doesn’t it, Ferris?”

Ferris: “Myu.”

His cat ears, which had drooped in relief, perked right back up at Julius’s remark. Keeping them perked, Ferris “Uu~”-ed under Julius and Reinhard’s gazes, and—

Ferris: “I don’t wanna admit it, so I don’t wanna say it to his face, but… well, he’s pretty okay, isn’t he?”

Reinhard: “Haha—coming from Ferris, that might be top-shelf praise.”

Ferris: “Shut it.”

At Reinhard’s comment, Ferris pulled a sour face, not wanting to have said it. Even so, Julius thought he was glad to have heard it. If Subaru had been present, they’d never have gotten Ferris’s honest take.

Julius: “By staggering his bath time, Subaru’s lost out, I suppose.”

Ferris: “Don’t ca~re. If Subaru-kyun were here, we wouldn’t be having this convo.”

Ferris turned his face away with a little “hmph,” and Reinhard said, “Sorry, sorry.” Beside them, Julius looked up at the sky and felt a twinge of regret that Subaru wasn’t here.

That said, the reason Subaru wasn’t here was that—oddly deep in the Wafuu culture of Kararagi as he was—he couldn’t stop getting distracted by everything in the inn. Seeing how delighted Subaru was made even the hosts, and Julius as Anastasia’s knight who chose the inn, feel it had all been worth it.

Then suddenly, Ferris let out a loud, “Ah!”

Reinhard: “What is it all of a sudden, Ferris?”

Ferris: “I just remembered. When I invited Subaru-kyun like, “let’s hit the hot spring~,” he got all flustered and told Ferri-chan he’d go later.”

Reinhard: “Subaru did? What did he say?”

Ferris: “…He said that once he got in the hot spring, he’d end up saying, “I feel revived.”“

Turning back, lips just under the water, Ferris muttered in chagrin.

Seriously, just how far did he know Wafuu culture—hot springs—inside out? It was exactly the fresh, vivid impression Ferris had blurted out.

Reinhard: “See, Subaru is something else after all.”

At Reinhard’s smile, Julius also relaxed his lips with a “heh” and agreed.

In truth, over this past year Subaru had piled up tireless effort, training, and achievements to try to become someone worthy of the Royal Candidate Emilia. On top of that, he’d even managed to run rings around Ferris—lauded as “Blue”—like this.

Julius: “He, too, is surely a fine worthy rival for us.”

Reinhard: “Personally, I’d like to add “friend” to left or right of that.”

Ferris: “You two go do that, then. Ferri-chan isn’t friends with Subaru-kyun.”

Whether he simply felt sore at having been outdone, or he was sulking, Ferris’s answer only deepened Julius’s and Reinhard’s smiles again.

It was a shame Subaru wasn’t here, but this was a topic that rarely came up as it was. He wanted to be straightforwardly grateful for the time in which he’d gained rare admiration and insight.

Only, while he thought that—

Julius: “—If you were here, would you have…”

With the brazenness and thick skin Ferris called him out for—and with the mental fortitude that had earned Reinhard’s respect—would he have stuck his nose into matters Julius couldn’t step into?

—Into the unbridgeable rift within the Sword Saint’s family, between Reinhard and Wilhelm.

Though they were under the same roof, the two didn’t seek each other’s faces or meet each other’s eyes. Would Subaru have done something Julius and Ferris couldn’t?

Ferris: “But but, it’s kinda a surprise to hear Reinhard think that way. “I’ll work hard to get along with everyone around me~”—is that Felt-sama’s influence?”

Leaving Julius’s inner thoughts aside—or perhaps having thought the same thing—Ferris forcibly steered the topic with Reinhard back to the original track. At that, Reinhard gave a slight wry smile.

Reinhard: “Maybe it is. Before, I thought it’d be enough if we kept a distance that wouldn’t get awkward in a pinch. But now it’s a little different.”

Julius: “Different—how so?”

Reinhard: “I’ve started more often to feel frustrated when my intent doesn’t get across correctly and causes misunderstandings. Not just about myself; Felt-sama, too, is someone who’s easily slighted or misunderstood.”

Julius: “I see. That is…”

At a loss for what to call it, Julius’s words caught.

Just as Ferris had pointed out, that was unmistakably due to Felt’s influence. The lord–retainer bond between Reinhard and Felt—that it was steadily deepening into trust—was proof of it. At the very least, it was certain Reinhard was reaching out from his side.

As that in itself, personally, Julius should rejoice; and as a knight of a Royal Candidate, he should lament that a formidable foe was shedding a skin.

But putting aside such stances and feelings, he thought this—It was a very human worry.

Julius: “Not as a “hero”…”

It was a fact that reached in, stirred up, and unsettled the fixed idea, the preconception, the tacit assumption—held even by Julius, who always defined Reinhard as his friend—that he was always and only that.

Reinhard was changing. That was a change that ought to happen if he compared it to himself. Julius, too—before and after the start of the Royal Selection—held a different mindset, a different way of being.

However, that such change was happening to Reinhard meant—

Ferris: "It's kinda like… I wanna casually say, "You're overthinking it, right?" but I can't flippantly go, "Just do whatever you want, Reinhard," and all. A dilemma."

Reinhard: "Thanks for saying it plainly. That's a thing I like about you, Ferris."

Ferris: "Yeah yeah, Ferri-chan, Ferri-chan."

He was truly grateful to Ferris for sliding that exchange into the little gap that had opened. Thanks to it, Julius didn't have to face his true feelings without bracing himself. —Or perhaps he ought to regret it as having left something undone.

Julius: "…Truly, what a hopeless case."

Brushing back his wet bangs beside the smiling exchange between Reinhard and Ferris, Julius once more thought about the happenstance of Subaru not being here.

If Subaru had been here, it felt like he would have said it. About Reinhard—said to be someone who could only ever be a "hero"—having a human worry.

That single line—"That's only natural,"—the line neither Julius nor Ferris could say so easily—he would have tossed it off without a second thought.

3

Subaru: "That's only natural, right? I'm, y'know, Emilia-tan's number-one knight. This much is the necessary cost so I don't give up a position I don't want to surrender to anyone."

As Subaru, soaking in the same bath, pointed at the many white scars on his body, Joshua was torn between astonishment and exasperation, yet still let out a definite breath of admiration.

Today had been a day that drained him both physically and mentally as a member of the hosting camp. Not wanting to embarrass not only Anastasia but Julius either, he felt as though he had literally kept his nerves strung taut down to the fingertips—no, to even a single strand of hair. Thanks to that, he had managed to avoid any real blunders, and he even received from Anastasia a "Ya did great. Good work," and Joshua felt a sure sense of satisfaction.

And then, as he soaked leisurely in the hot spring that was said to be one of the Water Plumage Inn's centerpieces, and found himself melting with an involuntary "Fuwaaah," he was hit by an unexpected ambush.

Subaru: "Oooh! What a huge hot spring! Garfiel and Otto are totally missing out!"

In this private-usage inn and private-usage open-air bath, he'd been waylaid by the boisterously arriving Natsuki Subaru, and Joshua found himself forced into an unexpectedly tense moment.

Subaru: "Well, truth is, I got invited to hit the hot spring together with Ferris and 'em, but, y'know, I kinda feel daunted, like—ya get me?"

Joshua: "Daunted… I cannot say I don't understand."

After covering himself in suds at the washing area, Subaru came to sit right beside him without so much as asking. At his line as he gave a big stretch, Joshua narrowed his eyes as he looked down at his own pale arm.

If Ferris's name was coming up, that carried the implication that Julius and Reinhard would be together as well. —Which was to say, lining up alongside the very pinnacle of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Just imagining being present at such a scene made Joshua's blood run cold. Only, that was because of Joshua's station. Subaru was different, and had to be different. He was someone who had decided from the start to stand on that side—.

Joshua: “You—”

Subaru: “You get it, right! Taking a bath together with Ferris—like, what kinda face am I supposed to make in there! I want him to properly be self-aware he’s a crossdresser!”

Joshua: “Eh, ah, h—eh?”

Joshua had been about to say, “Such timid stuff,” but his momentum was cut. Subaru, however, paid his reaction no mind, set a hand on his shoulder with a “I know, I know,” and—

Subaru: “Man, I’m seriously relieved there’s someone who thinks the same as me. Sure, Reinhard and Julius might be used to it, yeah? But even they had a first time, right? And yet… no, actually, those two kinda feel like they could handle it right from the start.”

Joshua: “Wh-What are you even talking about, what!”

As Subaru waxed sentimental, Joshua fumed at having been dragged into such a ridiculous topic. This was someone called the “Lolimancer,” who bore the same title of Spirit Knight as Julius, and on top of that was the number-one knight of a Royal Candidate. Even putting aside the fact that he’d been jerked around by incomprehensible rumors beforehand, such attitude and personality were too much of a bad joke.

Such a person had absolutely no right to stand on the same stage as Julius. Thinking that, Joshua went to remove Subaru’s arm from his shoulder—when he noticed them. —On that arm, and carved all over his body: far too many scars.

Subaru: “—? Huh, what’s up?”

Joshua: “Those… those many scars…”

Subaru: “Ah? Oh—these, yeah, the scars. I mean, braggin’ about scars is kinda embarrassing, but—”

And so, noticing Joshua’s eyes on his scars, Subaru—mixing in a bit of foul-mouthed bashfulness—began to talk; that was the start of the opening words about his scars.

Needless to say, every one of those scars came with pain, with blood shed; they were proof of times he had grit his teeth.

Each and every scar had a story, a reason Natsuki Subaru had staked his body. Hearing about those all-too-painful-looking marks, Joshua felt ashamed of himself for having pompously thought a moment ago that Subaru had no right to step onto the stage.

Joshua: “Natsuki-dono—you are a knight.”

Subaru: “Well, I did properly get knighted, so that’s how I think of myself, yeah? That said, there are still parts where, if you call me the knight, it doesn’t quite click for me yet.”

Joshua: “You even possess humility. Ani-sama has that about him as well.”

Julius, a member of the Royal Guard and a quintessential knight among the kingdom’s few, did not indulge the conceit that he was perfect as a knight. It was precisely Julius’s stance—of never neglecting the effort to bring perfection closer to perfection—that made Ani his knight. Subaru’s thinking, too—even if far from Julius in the reality—at least a trace of it could be glimpsed.

Joshua: “…Natsuki-dono, please allow me to apologize. In terms of actual ability, you doubtless fall far short compared to Ani-sama, but to judge that even your aspiration could not match his—that was my arbitrary misreading.”

Subaru: “I was just telling my old-scar history; why am I getting an apology outta nowhere? Also, that bit about me being way below Julius in ability is unnecessary!”

Joshua: “Then, that matter at the royal capital’s drill grounds I’ve heard of is…”

Subaru: “Gwah! The invisible old-scar history!”

Clutching his chest, Subaru let out a loud groan. Back when the start of the Royal Selection had been proclaimed, the story that he had clashed with Julius and had been badly beaten in a mock bout at the drill grounds had reached Joshua's ears as well.

Subaru: "Damn! I know I've got it comin' to be told that, but it still hurts when it's said. The nickname 'Lolimancer' is one thing, but since I can share the shame as a set with Beako, even if it looks bad, being known for that is still better…"

Joshua: "No, the rumor about that matter is—"

Covering his face with wet hands and lamenting, Subaru cut off Joshua's words mid-sentence. That incident at the drill grounds hadn't, in truth, spread much beyond those present in the capital at the time. That was because Julius, taking responsibility, had worked to keep the rumor from spreading, as a case of having summarily punished a miscreant could become a shame to the Royal Guard. The fact it had reached Joshua's ears as a rumor was because he was Julius's kin.

So he had meant to tell Subaru it wasn't something to worry himself over—but—

Subaru: "—? What now again?"

Joshua: "…My apologies. Natsuki-dono's gaze was so sharp I forgot what I was trying to say."

Subaru: "I'm aware I've got a bad look in my eyes, but if even after the hot spring's loosened me up nice you're still like that, maybe talkin' with me is just impossible for you?!"

Joshua: "Indeed. And so, please excuse me first."

As Subaru forced his eyes open wide with his fingers and raised his voice like that, Joshua bowed his head and rose from the bath. The long soak made his head sway a little, but he wanted to praise himself for not toppling over. And for not telling Subaru Julius's true intent.

That attitude of Subaru's was proof Julius's consideration hadn't reached his ears. Which is to say, proof above all that Julius's aim was going well.

Subaru: "Oh right, Joshua."

And then Subaru called out to Joshua as he was about to head back to the changing room. Joshua stopped his feet and turned just his head to see what it was; Subaru, still sunk in the bath—

Subaru: "Thanks for callin' us out to Priestella."

Joshua: "—It was not I who invited everyone, but Anastasia-sama."

Subaru: "I know that. But hey, I think it really was a good opportunity, and I feel great gettin' to soak in a hot spring like this, so I wanna thank the folks on the host side. 'Cept Julius."

Joshua: "The way you clearly set Ani-sama as an enemy is, indeed, correct."

Receiving both the words of thanks and the hostility from Subaru, Joshua nodded thus. As he'd answered, inviting the other camps had been Anastasia's arrangement, and Joshua had done no more than serve as messenger. That said, being thanked didn't feel bad. It had been an unexpected little spell of time, but he'd also learned that Subaru was not as outrageous a person as the rumors said. Whether that was a good thing or a bad thing was another matter—

Joshua: "—It seems it truly was a rare opportunity."

He had thought hot springs were outrageous things—soaking with someone else, outdoors, naked—but it felt like they'd had a conversation one could only have in a place like that.

4

—After savoring their soak in the hot springs and the banquet hall's "funamori," with the real reason for gathering—the conference—penciled in for tomorrow, everyone dispersed for the night.

It was all stuff they could look back on as rare experiences, and it drove home that Anastasia was a born merchant—she knew how to tickle people’s hearts.

Felt: “’Course, if ya asked Anastasia-neechan, she’d prolly be like, “Well, duh.” Still, starting from behind’s a pain when ya gotta claw yer way up.”

Crusch: “Felt-sama is “starting from behind”? I did not quite have that impression…”

Felt: “Don’t kid me. I’m a scruffy brat outta the slums, yeah? Even I ain’t buying I lined up even with the Duchess at the starting line.”

Crusch: “…That is indeed a stubborn fact. My apologies. I did not think that through.”

Felt: “Ain’t askin’ ya to apologize. That habit of sayin’ sorry right away? Ya oughta kick it. You weren’t like that before.”

Crusch: ““Before me,” is it… Yes, I suppose so.”

Propping her cheek on the knee she’d pulled up as she sat cross-legged on the veranda, Felt clicked her tongue at how her words had only deepened Crusch’s gloom. She hadn’t meant any ill will, but talking about the former “Crusch” to the current Crusch was bound to be lacking in consideration. Then again, avoiding it too hard would be over-consideration in the other direction.

Felt: “My bad. Didn’t mean to make ya feel crappy. But the thing I wanted to ask the Duchess about, well… it’s kinda chained to those Memories.”

Crusch: “It is quite all right. I was happy you called me out like this.”

Night had already fallen on the Water Gate City. Each camp had withdrawn to its rooms; all that remained was free time before sleep. In that lull, Felt had summoned Crusch out to the inn’s veranda to chat while looking over the nightscape.

The invitation had clearly surprised Crusch, but she’d accepted it readily.

Felt: “What’d ya tell yer cat-ears?”

Crusch: “No special excuse at all. I told him honestly that Felt-sama had called me to talk. Ferris wanted to come along, but…”

Felt: “I’ve got that bastard Reinhard waiting in my room, too. Anyway, thanks for indulgin’ my whim to talk one-on-one.”

Crusch: “If it meets your expectations, all the better. So then, what is it you wished to discuss?”

Felt, for her part, felt a firmness in Crusch that lay separate from her lost “Memories.” She had a reflexive, apologetic softness, and she often seemed to hold herself back, yet she had a sturdy bedrock under that—agreeing to a vaguely purposed summons, steering the talk toward actually understanding the other party’s aim.

Even so—

Felt: “I got two things. …One’s about you before you lost your Memories. Not that I knew the Duchess all that well back then.”

Crusch: “In what way is it about the former me?”

Felt: “Nothin’ fancy. Back then, looked to me like ya wanted to talk to me. I dunno why, and askin’ ya now might not help.”

Crusch: “…”

Narrowing her amber eyes, Crusch weighed Felt’s half-question. That earnest, visible contemplation made Felt recall the look Crusch had worn a year ago in the royal castle, when the Royal Selection was announced.

Felt: “Excuse me if this sounds like a lame excuse, but I was maxed out then and didn’t have the bandwidth to look around me. By the time I tried to think back on it after… well.”

Crusch: “By then I had already become who I am now, and the chance to ask had slipped away.”

Felt: “Bingo. So yeah, total “too little, too late.”“

How much of the past remained to the Crusch who had lost her Memories, Felt could not say. She herself had forgotten things before, but never "lost" them. And as a rival camp, hearing everything laid bare wouldn't be ideal either.

Even so—

Crusch: "My guess is… what the former me wished to speak about was the Royal Family of Lugunica who passed away before the Royal Selection."

Her answer was clear, contrary to Felt's expectation, and it made Felt blink.

Felt: "The Royal Family of Lugunica—the ones who died to that sickness, yeah? What's that got to do with me?"

Crusch: "I have just heard this from Ferris myself… but it seems we were acquainted with one of the late royals. As for you, Felt-sama, there is a rumor that you could be the royal who vanished a dozen-odd years ago."

Felt: "Oh, that junk."

The old suspicion brought up in all seriousness made Felt snort. The shining dragonstone that proved her qualification as a candidate, together with the rumor she was the child kidnapped a dozen years back, had been the springboards that "pushed" her into candidacy.

Felt did not believe that gossip for a second. If she really were that child, why would she have been raised in the capital's slums?

Felt: "The guy who raised me was a big ol' geezer with a big ol' heart. Don't tell me ya think Rom-ji was secretly some castle butler or whatever."

Crusch: "I do not know the gentleman, and I doubt the truth of your origin was what the former me most cared about."

Felt: "…Huh? If she wasn't interested, what was there to "confirm"?"

Crusch: “Not “interested” so much as “to make sure.”“

Crusch touched her breastbone lightly.

Crusch: “I hesitate to speak of the former me in my own mouth—but I believe she strove to be faithful to her convictions, and to embody them.”

Felt: “Heh. That matches my read.”

Crusch: “Thank you. If I imagine such a person paying you heed, Felt-sama… I think she feared you might fall ill.”

Felt: “Ill, as in…”

Crusch: “Yes. The very illness that took the royals, one by one.”

Crusch finished and then asked, “What do you think?” It was strange to have someone confirm her own prior thoughts through another, but Felt found the guess easy to accept.

There had, in fact, been those who worried she would manifest the disease because of the rumor around her birth.

Felt: “Our brainy sensei is a mage. Compared to yer cat-ears’ healing, he ain’t gonna win, but he’s pretty dang reliable.”

Crusch: “So he has been examining your body.”

Felt: “Says we gotta do regular checkups so we can breathe easy. So far, so good.”

Crusch: “I see. …Then I am sure the former me would be relieved. As am I now.”

Hand to chest, Crusch let out a genuine sigh of relief, and Felt could imagine her former self doing the same. Getting an answer she had not hoped for left Felt lighter. And since she was feeling greedy—

Felt: “This’s off the main topic, but… can I call ya “Crusch-neechan”?”

Crusch: "…! I—ah—well."

Felt: "No good?"

Crusch: "It is not that. Please do. …But, why?"

Felt: "I used to call ya "the tightwad-neechan," or the "half-devil-neechan," y'know? But over the past year I actually learned yer names—Crusch-neechan and the rest."

At that, Felt looked down at the ribbon of water mirroring the stars and moon. Both were far off in the sky, bright and out of reach.

Felt: "Lots went down this year. I ain't so blind anymore I can still claim "slum brat," "thieving brat" fits me best. Your station and your titles change. But names don't, right?"

Crusch: "…Yes. Even if what I was were to vanish somewhere, so long as there are people who call me by my name, I am Crusch Karsten."

Felt: "Same here. I'm Felt, and you're Crusch-neechan, Anastasia-neechan, and Emilia-neechan. That's why."

Crusch: "And Priscilla Barielle-sama…?"

Felt: "I don't like that princess."

Felt didn't want to dress it up as "recognizing" Crusch and Anastasia from on high, but she certainly did not want to approach Priscilla the same way as the other three. She would make the distinction, and if needed, she wouldn't shy from bias or a dogpile.

Crusch: "I must apologize to Priscilla-sama, but… I am honored, Felt-sama."

Felt: "It's just my own little line in the sand, Crusch-neechan."

Felt shrugged off Crusch's smile as nothing special, then raked her fingers through her own hair.

Felt: "And look at me, drifting off topic. That was the side quest I grew along the way. The other thing I wanted to talk about… is our hunk of junk and yer old man."

Crusch: "Wilhelm and Reinhard-sama."

Felt: "You know they're a messy granddad-and-grandson pair. …If ya can help it, don't butt in."

Crusch: "…May I hear your reason?"

Felt: "I ain't got the words lined up clean. Big picture? It's Gramps's and the idiot's problem."

Her answer wasn't a bulletproof syllogism, and Felt didn't think it had to be. This was a matter of feelings—and to her mind, that was exactly Reinhard's biggest problem.

Crusch: "…And if one of them were to ask for help?"

Felt flashed her sharp little canines. She appreciated that Crusch had sighted the core on her own—or maybe Crusch's heart ached over the same problem.

Felt: "If the idiot or Gramps came to me or to you and asked, then forget what I said about keepin' out."

Crusch: "Understood. I cannot give you a promise, but I will keep it in my heart."

Felt: "Heh. That's very much like you, Crusch-neechan."

Felt snorted at the hand Crusch pressed to her breast, leaving unspoken whether that was "like" the current Crusch or the former. Crusch did not seek to pin it down, either.

With that tacit agreement, shared between the two—

Crusch: "We may have finished the topics you came for, but… shall we talk a little longer?"

Felt: "Yeah. I was just gonna say the same."

Under the white, chill moon that looked down on the inn's garden and the Water Gate City's nightscape, Felt rolled a shoulder at Crusch's invitation, and the two Royal Candidates, in their yukata, enjoyed a little more of the quiet night side by side.

—At the same time, on the opposite side of the inn, the "Sword Demon" and the "Lolimancer" just so happened to be sharing a quiet moment of their own beneath the same moon.

5

Unusually, having been invited to join her for a nightcap, Al—though a bit at sea—found himself summoned to the bedchamber.

Age-wise he and Heinkel were both middle-aged, but compared to the man who drowned himself in liquor—literally soaked in booze—Al was hardly a fitting partner for drinks even without considering that he was a lightweight. Still, he couldn't help a tiny swell of superiority that it was he, not Heinkel, who'd been called in—

Priscilla: "Thou lookest like a cat granted a roof for the first time. Such a hunched, shrinking figure—were Schult to do it, it would have no charm; for thee, there is none at all."

Al: "I'm not tryin' to be cute, and who're you callin' a borrowed cat? It's just… as usual, Princess's negligee is murder on the eyes, and I can't put on my usual performance."

Firing off cheek to get his rhythm back, Al kept sneaking glances at Priscilla.

Priscilla, who laid claim to the most luxurious suite in one of Priestella's top-class inns, reigned over the night with the same unchanging beauty and arrogance no matter the place. Ordinarily at this hour she would share her bedchamber with Schult, whom she used as a hugging pillow. Yet tonight, there was no sign of Schult in the room.

Priscilla: "Schult I set to watch over that drunk. It would not be strange were that commoner to bolt at the last moment. I shan't let slip the rare chance for it to be of use.”

She pegged Al’s unspoken question perfectly, swirling the amber liquor in her glass.

Truly, it was enough to make one wonder if she read minds. They say eyes speak louder than mouths, but Al’s eyes—and even his face—were hidden behind a helmet. How did Priscilla see through him so unerringly?

Priscilla: “Breathing, the use of thine eyes, thy little courtesies—each is a clue that bares the detail.”

Al: “Horrors, horrors, horrors! That’s terrifying when I ain’t said a word! Guess I can’t stare at the Princess and think anything spicy ever again!”

Priscilla: “I do not intend to peer into the innards of thy skull and censure thee. Were I to punish every unreachable desire my beauty inspires, there would be no end.”

Al: “Much obliged, ma’am.”

Priscilla moistened her lips with drink and slid her crimson gaze over Al. That sultry look traced his spine; he involuntarily drew breath.

The tension of being invited into her bedchamber had eased—somewhat—but the core question of why Priscilla had summoned Al at all remained.

Al: “If you wanted someone to watch the old man, I’d be the right pick, yeah? Keepin’ cute Schult-chan up past his bedtime ain’t like you, Princess. Didn’t even bring the book he’s readin’. Killing boredom’s his special skill, right?”

Priscilla: “Thy tongue flaps merrily. No need to heat thy heart so—once we have done, I shall chase night out at once. …Thou dost know the vixen’s inn?”

Al: “…Yeah. The Water Plumage Inn.”

At her slight lowering of tone, Al answered tersely.

The host of this Priestella gathering of Royal Candidates—Anastasia—had prepared that very inn for her far-traveled guests: the Water Plumage Inn.

He had figured that, since she was inviting Royal Candidates, the highest-grade inn in the city would be the choice and had even taken a guess for tonight's lodging—but he'd missed the mark.

Al: "Honestly, when I realized I'd guessed the wrong place, I thought we were done for. Never occurred to me she'd pick the inn for its entertainment value, not its rank."

Priscilla: "I doubt the vixen "deliberately" chose amiss, yet as an appraisal of her character, it is natural enough. Of course, the sin of making me take a fruitless step is grave, but…"

Al: "Gulp… "Grave," but?"

Priscilla: "This inn's hospitality and service are not poor. Counting that, I shall let the head remain."

Al: "Hah—lived to see another dawn! Air's delicious!"

With a stately nod she let the lapse slide; Al pumped a quiet fist with one hand.

Landmines that might cost a man his life dotted the ground around Priscilla, but being blown up over a lodging guess felt unreasonably cruel even to Al.

Al: "Still, why'd she pick the Water Plumage Inn…? Wantin' to brag about Kararagi, maybe. Wafuu architecture just looks all kinds of quirky to me."

Priscilla: "Call it odd all thou wish; from thy lips, aught is stripped bare. In any case, I have spared thy neck. I shall save the amusement for the morrow."

Al: "Then I better turn in early… But is that all you wanted to tell me?"

Priscilla: “Fool.”

With the grand act of slipping secretly into the Watergate City and crash-landing openly into the candidates’ meeting before them, Priscilla crisply rebuked him.

That answer, at least, was as expected—but Al had not a clue what the real topic was. Why, exactly, had Priscilla called for him—

Priscilla: “—I permit it. Do as thou must, for the sake of doing what thou must.”

It was a statement so vague, so shapeless, and so unfriendly to comprehension that it could only sow confusion.

Lacking the basic courtesies of clear intent or considerate phrasing, from anyone else it would have sounded like sleep talk. Stripped of ornament, nothing but core intent—yet because it came from Priscilla Barielle, and to Aldebaran—Al understood enough.

Priscilla: “Do not hesitate needlessly. Do not toady needlessly. Do not pity without meaning. Do not flail in falsehood. Do not waste in idleness. Do not lament a lapse. Do not balk at ruthlessness. Do not fear discourtesy.”

Reading Al’s silent assent yet again, Priscilla layered the words.

The fusillade both furnished Al with criteria he could not look away from and rekindled his unease at how much she saw.

Al: “Just what do those jewel-like eyes of yours actually see, Princess?”

Priscilla: “Spare me such questions. The world as it is, I see in truth. Thou, with that helm, narrowest thy view—thus thou canst not perceive what I do.”

Al: “…If a man can’t see what you see, is he useless?”

Priscilla: “Fool. Who could see more clearly than I what lies before me? If so, one who sees the same from the same height is of no interest.”

Al: “…”

Priscilla: “Mark it well, Al. Thou art my clown. Then fulfill thy role as a clown. A clown exists to amuse the master. To let aught but me into thy view—what impudence.”

With lordly clarity that admitted no rebuttal, Priscilla Barielle declared it.

Her crimson gaze and that voice that made souls submit demanded something of him. While groping at that uncertain shape, Al again sensed a sign he’d long been aware of.

When those who move the world gather, a great wave inevitably rises—and the change it brings. Perhaps Priscilla, too, was sensing it.

If so, then maybe—just maybe—a seed called anxiety might sprout in that rich breast of hers, something most unlike her.

Should that, by any chance, be true—

Al: “—No need to worry, Princess.”

Priscilla: “…”

Al: “You’ve got me. Whatever happens, I’ll save you.”

He tapped his own chest with a thumb and declared it to her head-on.

He’d resolved it in his heart countless times, but rarely had he said it to her face. Now he did.

Priscilla’s crimson eyes grew moist; her lips curved with joy and—

Priscilla: “Why trumpet the obvious? A teetotaler drunk on himself is an eyesore.”

Al: “Huh?! That didn’t tickle the Princess’s maiden circuits at all?! And I even mustered real courage!”

His earnest appeal swung and missed; Al yelped. With a lazy flap of her hand to shoo the noise, Priscilla's lips at last drew a smile.

A smile Al knew well and had fallen for many times—the Sun Princess's smile, untouched by weakness.

And then she spoke.

—"The world, for me, is arranged to my convenience."

Chapter 4:
The Day of Execution

—On that day, the stars gathered in the Watergate City advanced with their respective designs in their hearts.

Crusch: “Ferris, how is Wilhelm doing?”

Ferris: “…He said he wants to be alone for a bit. Crusch-sama, can you say anything to him?”

Crusch: “It is difficult. Leaving aside Reinhard-sama, it looked like the quarrel with his son hit him quite hard. Heinkel-sama, was it?”

Ferris: “Geez! I hate the Vice-Captain! He’s always like that, making everyone around him tiptoe… honestly, he’s a burden not just to the Knights, but to the whole kingdom!”

Gently laying her hand over Ferris’s and stroking it to calm him, Crusch continued, Please calm yourself.

Crusch: “To both you and me, Wilhelm is a precious person, yes? When the time comes that he wishes to borrow someone’s hand, we at least must keep from letting our hearts be thrown into disorder, so we can be the first to extend that hand.”

Ferris: “…You’re right. And on top of that, we’ve got the information on “Gluttony” Anastasia-sama said she would share.”

Crusch: “Yes. Surely this is our trial by fire.”

Ferris blinked roundly as Crusch lifted their interlaced fingers and declared that. He let the ends of his round brows droop and turned a gentle gaze to Crusch.

Ferris: “Crusch-sama, since when did you get so dependable? If you make me fall for you all over again, Ferri-chan’s gonna go all weak in the knees.”

Crusch: “That would be troublesome. Ferris, you are my first knight,

after all.”

Ferris: “Yeees, Crusch-sama. Ferri-chan will work hard enough for Wil-ji’s share too.”

Exchanging a nod with Ferris’s reassuring words as they held hands, Crusch smiled—so she would not be swayed by a wavering, uncertain “her own self,” but would define herself with dignity.

Al: “Hey, hey, Princess, where’re you off to?”

Priscilla: “I have taken in full the farce of the “Sword Saint’s” family. I also beheld, unexpectedly, the faces of those who are spoken of on the same level as me. In which case, there remains one last thing to ascertain.”

Al: “And that’d be…?”

Priscilla: “Naturally, the so-called “Songstress” who is doing her share to add to this city’s bustle.”

Covering her mouth with her opened fan, Priscilla declared so; inside his helmet Al blinked rapidly. After crashing the Royal Candidates’ meeting at the Water Plumage Inn, he hadn’t expected the “Songstress” to come up again.

Al: “Surprisingly, you were hung up on that whole “princess” connection Schult-chan mentioned?”

Priscilla: “Do not belittle me with such paltry conjectures. ’Tis disrespect. —I heard her singing through the Meteor; I am curious what the real article amounts to.”

Al: “Yikes, my condolences.”

If Priscilla had set her eyes on her, then regardless of whether the assessment was good or bad, it was proof that walking a smooth road would grow difficult.

As Al spared some sympathy for the yet-unseen Songstress’s position, Priscilla turned on her heel. Without attendants, she meant to stride off in stately fashion; Al moved to follow and—

Priscilla: "—Al, do not forget for an instant the golden words I gave thee last night."

Al: "…"

Priscilla: "When I have need of thee, be at my side."

Told without words not to come along, Al could only fiddle with the clasp of his helmet as he saw her off. Irritating her here and trying his luck with the turning of the stars against Priscilla would be putting the cart before the horse. —Then all that remained was to display, just as expected of him, Al's manner of being toward the foreboding.

Hence—

Al: "—I'll be counting on you to go easy on me, Fate, ma'am."

Anastasia: "Honestly, what a nasty lot they are."

Puffing her cheeks and voicing her displeasure without hiding it, Anastasia stroked the fox scarf at her neck and fumed. Julius, taking his lady's reaction as only natural, set a finger to his lips.

Julius: "Even so, how did Priscilla-sama learn of today?"

Anastasia: "As much as it galls me, the Princess was right that ya can't completely block information… but what sticks in my craw most is that she actually managed it on her end."

Julius: "…Vice-Captain Heinkel's presence was a blind spot."

Anastasia: "This one's entirely our blunder. I ended up letting the Princess spring a surprise on both Felt-san and Crusch-san. —Julius, you understand, don'tcha?"

Asked thus by those asagi-colored eyes, Julius straightened his back and dipped his chin. To say “Priscilla was simply the better player” and call it done was not Anastasia’s way; to lament her own insufficiency and resolve to correct it was. Julius, too, would support that with all his might.

Julius: “From here on, let us approach matters without letting our guard down. —That is the responsibility we must fulfill, we who arranged this meeting.”

Anastasia: “’Kay, long as you get it. …Even so, when are Mimi and Hetaro and Tivey, and Ricardo too, gonna come back, huh?!”

Felt: “And about now, I bet Anastasia-neechan and the others are fussin’ just like that.”

Reinhard: “Most likely. …Felt-sama, about what happened at breakfast…”

Felt: “I said what I had to say, and you heard what you had to hear. I don’t plan on sayin’ anything more.”

Sticking out her tongue, Felt cut off the kind of exchange that only sapped motivation as Reinhard seemed about to stack apologies. Instead, she jerked her chin toward their front—toward the tavern where their target awaited.

Felt: “What I wanna hear is whether you’ve got the guts to talk to your old man. Well?”

Reinhard: “—Yes, please allow me to accompany you. I am Felt-sama’s knight.”

Felt: “Don’t you dare forget you said that with that face on!”

Giving the straight-backed Reinhard a firm slap between the shoulder blades, Felt strode boldly through the tavern door to have the talk needed to win the future—with the “freeloader.”

Thus far, the steps of stars that inscribe history have been told.

And now to be told are the steps to go beyond those stars that inscribe history.

Do not ever turn your eyes away. And on top of that, do not forget to sear it into your soul.

—The earnest twinkling of the stars will repel the malice descending upon the Watergate City Priestella.

END

Movie Specials

Bonds of Ice:
Before Memories
(LQ AI Translation)

Prologue:
Bonds of Ice / Once upon a Time

???: “Even so, Subaru, you’re surprisingly capable, huh.”

Subaru: “Huh? Where’d that come from all of a sudden?”

Lifting his face at the voice that fell from overhead was the black-haired boy, Natsuki Subaru. To call him a dimension-lost wanderer summoned to another world sounded cool, but to put it plainly, he was a drifter. Owing to a strange twist of fate, Subaru lived at the Roswaal Manor, where, dressed in a butler’s uniform, he devoted himself to odd jobs.

There, without warning, that opening line was thrown at him, and still in his mopping posture, Subaru turned around. Narrowing his already sharp eyes even further at the owner of the voice—the gray little cat floating in midair—

Subaru: “Some of us are in the middle of work here, and you’re acting like a pampered house cat. Must be nice.”

Puck: “A big reason I do the spirit thing is this flex time system. Well, of course I do have an activity limit, but how you make it all fit together is where a business nyan shows his chops.”

Subaru: ““Business nyan,” he says. And if we’re talking time management, honestly, you’re not that great at pacing yourself. I haven’t forgotten what happened at the Loot House.”

Puck: “Good grief, if you only remember people’s bad sides, it’ll make your personality worse, you know?”

Subaru: “Then quit going out of your way to say things that beg for a comeback.”

With a half-lidded stare, Subaru shot back, and the flying kitten, Puck, stroked his own whiskers as he answered. Puck was the spirit contracted to Emilia, the girl Subaru had feelings for, but his activity during the day seemed to be basically free, and he often spent his time just like this. Of course, most of the time he could be seen at Emilia's side, but depending on the case, he would play with Beatrice, or, like now, come to tease Subaru while he worked.

For that reason, chatting with Puck during work like this was nothing unusual.

Subaru: "So? What is it I'm supposedly so capable at? If you suddenly praised me… you were praising me, right?"

Puck: "No need to doubt that. I was just impressed that Subaru was thinking about Lia more than I expected. Ah, not that I'm acknowledging anything at all, though."

Subaru: "Don't dash my hopes before I can even say anything."

Cradling a tail as long as his own height while he drifted through the air, Puck spoke, and Subaru puckered his lips, protesting that he wasn't even given time to get the wrong idea. For Subaru, who day by day harbored deeper feelings for Emilia, getting on the good side of Puck, her guardian-position, was a matter of life and death. "If you would shoot the general, first shoot his horse," went the famous saying—but in otherworldly terms, "If you want an angel, you've gotta woo the house cat first."

Puck: "Those snow statues of that family—you really watched them closely. You must've been pretty nervous on your date."

Subaru: "Aaah, well, if it's Emilia-tan, I wanna watch her without missing a single second, y'know? Also, the most nerve-wracking parts of a date are the meetup and the main event, right? Thanks to that, the flower field main event went over great, so my nerves had loosened up too."

Puck: "And thanks to that, you got to rack up Lia points with the snow statues on the side. Mm-hmm, not missing your chance."

Subaru: "There's malice in the way you say it!"

Whether he was impressed or making fun of him, Puck's phrasing made Subaru pull a face like he'd just bitten into something bitter.

Then, tilting his head as if remembering,

Subaru: “Come to think of it, I never asked for the details… Is there some connection between Emilia-tan and snow statues?”

Puck: “You could say there is, and you could say there isn’t. They don’t have anything in particular to do with that snow statue that looked like it was about to melt. I just remembered the past a little, that’s all.”

Subaru: “The past, huh…”

Still tilting his head, Subaru leaned his weight on the mop. Watching him, Puck went “Hmm, let’s see,” and let out a small hum.

Puck: “Subaru, do you remember how old you were seven years ago?”

Subaru: “Well, you just subtract seven from my current age, so I should’ve been ten, right?”

Puck: “Ten, huh~. In that case, that was when Subaru was still about the size of a grain of rice.”

Subaru: “I don’t know if that’s a difference in a spirit’s sense of time or some fuzzy long-lived-species thing, but I was bigger than a grain of rice from the moment I came out of the womb.”

From what he’d heard, Subaru had apparently been larger than average when he was born. He’d been close to three thousand five hundred grams. Well, bigger than a grain of rice, without a doubt.

Subaru: “Anyway, why seven years ago?”

Puck: “Mm~. Because that’s about when it ties in with me, Lia, and a snowy episode, I suppose? Back when Subaru was a mischievous little brat, Lia was cute like a jewel.”

Subaru: “That’s the first time I’ve heard of someone literally treating a cute girl like a jewel.”

And replying like that, Subaru continued with, “But—”

Subaru: “Seven-years-ago Emilia-tan, huh. I’m not Puck, but she must’ve been really cute. Oh—of course, the Emilia-tan of today is an angel too. E.M.T.!”

Emilia: “—? Did you just call me?”

Subaru: “Uhyah—!!”

A voice like a chiming bell hit him off guard, and Subaru leaped up and clung to Puck. “Nyanyan?!” yelped the startled Puck as Subaru hugged him, then Subaru hastily looked back.

And there, at the end of Subaru’s gaze, was the girl with round eyes, Emilia.

With long, beautiful silver hair and amethyst eyes like gemstones—and a superlative beauty. What other descriptors were necessary? Delicate and lovely—that was Emilia.

Emilia: “A-Are you okay? Geez, if you react like that, you’ll make me reaaally jumpy.”

Subaru: “S-Sorry, sorry. I didn’t plan on pulling off a standing long jump like that, but we were just talking about Emilia-tan, so I kinda… y’know.”

Puck: “Hey now. Getting leapt on in passing and having my fur messed up is more than I can take. Hmph, I’m miffed.”

Wearing a vague smile as he excused himself, Subaru let Puck slip from his hands. Puffing up his tousled fur, Puck then moved as if to his reserved seat—onto Emilia’s shoulder.

Emilia: “You were just talking about me—what kind of whisper-whisper were you two having?”

Subaru: ““Whisper-Whisper” isn’t something people say these days… Anyway, it wasn’t anything weird. Just talking about how cute Emilia-tan is, and how you’re like a jewel…”

Emilia: “A jewel…? Am I that round? Hehe, thanks for the compliment.”

Subaru: “Huh?! You’re responding more to “like a jewel” than to “cute”?!”

Smiling at the surprised Subaru, Emilia cheerfully stroked Puck’s ear. If Emilia was happy, there was no problem, but for Subaru it ended in keenly feeling his own lack of firepower. At any rate, the topic being Emilia and seven years ago was indeed the case.

Subaru: “We were just talking about something about seven years ago. Imagining a teeny, adorable Emilia-tan makes my chest go kyun-kyun.”

Emilia: “About me? Hm, I wonder. I don’t really remember much from when I was small… I think I’d rather hear about Subaru when you were little. Ummm…”

Subaru: “Seven years ago?”

Emilia: “Right, seven years ago. That was when Subaru was still a baby, wasn’t it.”

Subaru: “You too, Puck—but what do I look like to you two, and how old do you think I am?!”

Raising his voice at the guileless Emilia, Subaru then cleared his throat. To be honest, even Subaru, looking back, did not have memories rich enough to speak at length, but there was that saying —every person had their history—so he would pick his words and tell a little story.

Subaru: “Well, it doesn’t have to be limited to seven years; when you’re alive, lots of things happen. I’m sure I’ve got memories, and so do Emilia-tan, Puck, Ram, Rem, Ros-chi, and Beako—everyone’s got something…”

Emilia: ““Everyone’s got something”?”

Subaru: “I’m saying, it’s nice to be nostalgic once in a while. Now then, which of my episodes should I tell, I wonder.”

Emilia: “Wow, I’m reaaally looking forward to it.”

Seeing Emilia’s shining eyes and her hands clasped before her chest, he felt the bar rise. Still, to retreat here was not what a man did. Subaru was a boy, so he had his pride—and the girl before him was the one he loved, so in every sense, there was no turning back.

Subaru: “All right then, let’s tell a story for now. There’s a bit of a set piece a storyteller’s gotta do for this kind of tale.”

Emilia: “A set piece?”

Puck: “Heeey, you’re going pretty all-in. I’m excited to hear what sort of story this’ll be.”

Emilia tilted her head, and Puck, rubbing his cheek against her tilted cheek, were his audience. Smiling at the two, Subaru gave a ceremonious bow with, “Now then, if I may have your kind attention—”

Subaru: “Loooong ago, in a certain place—”

Chapter 1:
Bonds of Ice / Seven Years Ago / Priscilla Camp

1

The instant he slipped under the swinging flash of the blade, several strands of hair, too slow to escape, spun through the air.

They wavered in air parched with killing intent, then fell onto blood-soaked ground. A bare foot crushed them underfoot, and the man sprang far back, out of reach of the cleaver.

Breathing raggedly, the man’s shoulders rose and fell.

The sweat running down his brow came less from physical fatigue than from the grind on his nerves. Disliking the sting when it got in his eyes, he wiped it away roughly with the back of the hand gripping his blade.

Man: “…”

The man had wiped his sweat; facing him stood a bald giant, his whole body marked by sword wounds. A brutal blade in each hand, eyes slick with violence and killing intent stabbed toward the man.

What floated on that face was not anguish, but a grin of exhilaration that savored the fight. For the giant, this place was truly a paradise. —Being a gladiator was no doubt his vocation.

Man: “…give me a break.”

He sighed at the giant, who was making full use of his blessed build and talent and reveling in his prime. His grumbling mutter, however, reached no one’s ears here. Why? It was only natural. For —

???: “—Hk!”

Because cheers were pouring down from overhead like a downpour, filling the arena where lives were locked in a struggle.

—Gladiator Island Ginunhive is an entertainment city within the Sacred Vollachian Empire. The city exists for a simple reason: to run arenas where people can spectate people killing one another—strictly speaking, bouts pitting humans and Witchbeasts are sometimes staged as well, but that is a trivial matter.

What matters is that, in this arena, the taking of lives can be enjoyed as entertainment.

And—

Man: “Right now, we are the bugs being made to kill each other in the bug cage—that is where we stand.”

With a tone dripping with irony, the man—the one-armed fellow—shrugged.

A shabby outfit and a nicked-up cleaver; his gear differed little from the giant’s. Even so, the missing arm and the roughly thirty centimeters he lacked in height made the pairing feel downright malicious.

That said, lamenting his shortcomings or appealing to the referee about unfairness would not change a thing. After all, the arena did not classify gladiators by weight, and above all, there was only one rule here.

—The one who dies is at fault.

Man: “Whoops, that is not just here. That is the rule for the whole Empire.”

He muttered briefly and tapped his own shoulder lightly with the spine of his cleaver. Then, the next instant, the giant, who had been waiting for this, leaned forward and closed the distance, turning into a living battering ram.

At the giant bulk’s sprint, light as if it had no weight, the bigwigs in the stands let out vulgar cheers. What they wanted was a gruesome spectacle of bursting blood and bone, the very instant a life was cruelly scattered.

In that sense, the greatest delight would be for the giant's blade to hack the man to pieces, but—

Man: "Too bad for you. I am not going to play along with that."

Dropping a word to no one's ears, the man also stepped forward of his own accord.

The charging giant raised his arms and brought a blow down from overhead with thunderous force. He dodged it with a sideways leap; fissures from the slash split the ground where it struck, and he caught, at the edge of his vision, a great plume of dust billowing up.

As is, he would cut into the giant's legs, now halted, then, with the returning blade, take the neck—

Man: "That is just what you were hoping I would do, right?"

???: "…"

Just before he stepped in, a cleaver swept sideways past the tip of his nose, its momentum killed.

Using a ferocious sword strike as bait, he lured opponents into a gap he had made on purpose. That delicate killing technique, out of keeping with his giant frame, was the secret art that had kept him winning until today on Gladiator Island.

But now that it had been seen through, the giant's fate was sealed. —Just as he had made others until now, he would simply become fresh blood soaking into this arena.

Man: "Later. Your luck… no, your stars were bad."

The cleaver he swung on a diagonal mercilessly mowed off the giant's head.

—Blood spray and cheers rose high into the sky over the arena.

2

Girl: "Hmph, I see. So this is the spectacle of Gladiator Island."

Man: “A-Ah, yes. So, how was it? Did it meet your expectations?”

Girl: “Expectations? …Ah, indeed. In the sense that the curiosity in this breast was satisfied, one could say it met my expectations. It was not bad. I shall commend you.”

Man: “I-I see!”

At the words of praise from his companion, the man’s eyes lit up in a flash, and he patted his chest in relief.

He was a middle-aged man nearing fifty, and judging from the hair on his head beginning to go white here and there, one could say he looked no different from someone in their early old age. His grooming was in order, and a more than fitting amount of money had been spent on the clothes he wore.

A person whose appearance marked him at a glance as someone of standing—precisely because of that, it was a strange sight.

By age alone, he was someone who should give orders rather than be ordered around. Of course, even in such a position, one would humble oneself before a superior, but in this case, the counterpart was who she was.

—For the one speaking with the man was a girl still far too young to be called grown.

She was a terrifyingly, eye-catchingly beautiful girl.

Her hair, orange like the thought of sunlight, was adorned with jewels, and with eyes as red as blood she gazed challengingly over the world.

The shoulders and legs peeking from her dress, the white skin smooth enough to seem translucent, called to mind the supreme feel of a touch that would put every bolt of cloth in this world beneath her heel.

Simply by standing there, she was a demonic beauty that disturbed the composure of all people—a manifestation of peerless beauty; perhaps that was the air worn by this twelve-year-old girl who could hardly yet be called a woman.

With long, narrow eyes, the girl looked around in curiosity; at that figure, her companion's throat sounded. The fact that it was born of awe and a bit of lust, spoke eloquently of the relationship between the two.

Far from parent and child, the two were separated by an age gap like grandfather and grandchild, yet they were not blood-related. The relationship between the two was an affinal one—in other words, they were husband and wife.

Of course, among nobles, marriages with large age differences and without love fall within the bounds of common sense.

It is common to contract a marriage in form to strengthen ties between houses. However, that did not apply to this pair.

Because this beautiful girl had no backing other than that beauty.

Only her beauty, and the overflowing intellect, were the girl's possessions. That alone had been the reason this middle-aged man decided on marriage with a girl so young.

And on this day, at the girl's wish, the two set foot on Gladiator Island to spectate the most barbaric entertainment in the Vollachian Empire, the killing that sent people into a frenzy.

For his part, the man, who was weak with blood, wore a pale face from beginning to end. Yet the girl's profile, coolly seeing death through to its end, was so beautiful it made him tremble, and it was worth being enthralled by.

Girl: "Even so, that you overcame your distaste for blood for my sake—it was a great service."

Man: "—Eh?"

Girl: "What is this, did you not hear? I praised that labor of yours."

Hiding her mouth with the fan she held, the girl slanted her eyes toward the man. Seeing the emotion that flickered in those crimson eyes, the man involuntarily caught his breath.

Such a young girl held dominion over his life. He felt that his thinking had plainly been driven mad, cracks had opened in the steady path he had walked, and there were signs his world was collapsing with a roar.

Even so, he could not reject it. Sinking into a sweet demise, the pleasure of decaying.

The desires of ruin and decadence were fulfilled simply by being at the girl's side.

While savoring the setting sun of his own life, the man smiled and bowed his head to the girl—his wife.

And—

Man: "Ah, it is an honor, Priscilla. What is it you would have me do next?"

3

Jorah Pendalton was, as an imperial noble, a mediocre man with nothing worth noting.

Survival of the fittest, the strong devour the weak, enrich the nation, strengthen the military. —In the Vollachian Empire, where such ideas hold sway, there was no place for a man whose only virtue seemed to be earnestness.

In short, he was a man unsuited to being an imperial noble. That was Jorah.

He himself understood that the Empire's water did not suit him, and precisely because of that, Jorah had, up to now, avoided stirring up waves with those around him and resigned himself to a meager life in the shade.

He had nothing to do with staking everything on a great gamble in life. His role was to pass the house on to the next generation. It was an irony that, because of such timid thinking, he had not been blessed with a good match up to this age.

—Yet precisely because he had remained single, there was also a miracle that sprouted.

Priscilla: "—Is it so enjoyable to do nothing but stare at me so blatantly?"

Startled when his gaze at the girl was pointed out, Jorah opened his eyes wide.

Without the slightest awareness, he had been entranced, forgetting even to breathe, by the girl reading a book — his wife, Priscilla. Realizing that fact, Jorah toyed with his forelock with his fingers.

Jorah: "S-Sorry. I just, could not help but be captivated."

Priscilla: "Hmph, I see. It cannot be helped. The reason people are captivated by paintings and jewels is because a true beauty without rationale resides there. True beauty enchants people. All the more so if that beauty is me."

What an arrogant way of speaking from the girl, who snorted and gracefully crossed her legs. Yet the reason he felt no urge to deny it was, in truth, because she was beautiful.

"…"

Even in the gaps of conversation, those crimson eyes did not cast even a sidelong glance at Jorah. She turned the pages of the book placed upon her lap and greedily chewed over the story as she read on.

Come to think of it, she was a girl he saw constantly in the act of reading.

There was no doubt that the source of her overflowing intellect lay in the vast number of books she had read to completion up to now. That is to say, reading was, for her, the act necessary to store up knowledge and to soar to greater heights, to sublimate the existence that was her.

Put another way, one could say he was witnessing the process of her completion.

To be enthralled by a thing beautiful beyond reason is the essence of human beings. Yes, if what she had just said was true, then the reason Jorah had taken her as his wife and could not take his eyes off her lay in that.

Perhaps the reason he wanted to do as she said, to indulge her selfishness, all of it.

Therefore—

Jorah: "Priscilla. It was a short time, but spending it with you was a blissful moment."

Priscilla: "…"

Jorah: "I am a cowardly man. Until now, I have lived by slowly spending down the good fortune with which I was blessed by birth. Carefully, as though scooping with a teaspoon. But…"

There, Jorah was at a loss for words.

It was not because he had not thought ahead, nor because he faltered from his usual lack of confidence, nor any such backward reason.

The reason was simple.

Priscilla: "…"

— Priscilla's eyes were looking not at the book, but at Jorah.

Crimson eyes, beautiful as if they were rubies themselves, were fixed straight upon Jorah. Receiving that gaze, which urged him to go on without a word, Jorah's throat sounded.

It was a terribly foolish story, but in that moment Jorah, for the first time, gained a real sense of it.

That a tiny existence like himself had, for the first time, been properly cast as a character in the life of the girl before him — Priscilla — and been given lines.

Therefore—

???: "—Count Jorah Pendalton! On suspicion of high treason, you are under arrest!"

Even at the sharp call from outside the manor, he felt proud of himself for not letting his heart waver.

4

Imperial soldiers clad in golden armor surrounded the estate of Mid Count Jorah Pendleton.

To be armored in golden gear from head to toe was an honorable attire permitted only to regular servicemen of the Sacred Vollachian Empire. Each bore their own favored weapon—swords, spears, axes, even whips—but at least their armor was unified, signaling a strong sense of solidarity—no, that was a mistake.

???: "…"

Within the cohort clad in golden armor, there was not a shred of awareness of coordination or solidarity. It was a group whose members differed in their weapon of choice and, accordingly, in their personalities; it was impossible for such a group to come together peaceably.

Thus, if there was anything that commanded them, it was not some formless thing like team spirit, but something clearer and more concrete—namely, power.

Pure power bound and commanded them. That was the Empire's one, absolute rule.

Soldier: "General First-Class Ralfon, deployment is complete."

Goz: "Mm, understood. Stand down."

At the report from the subordinate at his side, a middle-aged man whose face was covered in scars gave a grave dip of the chin. A giant frame clad in a sturdy cuirass of muscle, and over that, golden gear—a full suit of armor.

He looked like he was made from head to toe—nay, down to every drop of blood flowing in him—of the word “warrior,” and in truth, he was the sort to take pride in evoking precisely that impression.

Goz Ralfon—this was the name of the middle-aged man, and he was one of the strongest in the Empire, entrusted with the position of General First-Class, the highest rank a soldier could hold in the Vollachian Empire.

Headed by Goz, the cohort surrounding the manor was wrapped in a grim atmosphere. That was only natural—their objective was to apprehend a man who had committed treason against the Empire. It could even turn into combat, depending on the circumstances, and that was precisely why they had been dispatched.

However, should it indeed come to rough work, the thing that merited the utmost vigilance was less the Mid Count Pendleton’s private soldiers than the person thought to be sheltered in his bosom—

For an instant, Goz narrowed his eyes in a fleeting speculation, then promptly shook his head to cast off idle suspicion.

Then Goz straightened the back of his giant frame, stepped out from the ranks of the subordinates around him, drew in a great breath, and—

Goz: “—Count Jorah Pendleton! On suspicion of high treason, you are under arrest!”

At that shout, the soldiers in golden armor smashed down the manor’s front entrance.

The charges had already been established, and there would be no mercy of granting a chance to explain. His person would be secured with haste, and from there, the task would be handed to those best suited to extracting the rest.

Goz: “All the more so!”

It was with a sense of pride that this scene had been entrusted not to another, but to himself.

Moments after the soldiers in gold rushed into the manor, the air rang with a fierce clash of blades. Apparently, the Mid Count Pendleton had also laid soldiers in wait within the manor, and a battle had begun.

Goz: “I do not intend to grant you much time.”

With a short declaration, Goz took up the weapon he had stood at his own side. It was a two-handed long-hafted arm, with a great round iron ball fixed to its tip—a kind of weapon called a tsuchihoko.

He hefted the nearly one-hundred-kilogram thing with ease, then, in a single bound, his giant frame vaulted over his men’s heads. With a single flash of a mighty arm, the tsuchihoko swung crosswise, and the foes blocking his path were sent flying in a group.

Goz: “Out of the way! We act under His Excellency’s imperial command. If you defy us, you too will be rebels, the same as Count Jorah Pendleton!”

Soldiers: “…”

A voice so loud it made the very air tremble cowed the Mid Count’s soldiers who stood with weapons at the ready.

From his reputation, he did not seem to have any right-hand man of famed martial prowess.

Naturally, facing Goz Ralfon, a General First-Class, it seemed unlikely there would be anyone with the backbone to brandish their weapons openly.

However—

Jorah: “—I am at a loss that General First-Class Ralfon himself has deigned to appear.”

Beyond the front entrance, in the great hall that lay ahead, on the top of the grand staircase that connected that hall to the second floor, a slender figure appeared, shoes striking the steps. Looking up at him, Goz drew his stern brows together.

It was a familiar face—none other than the very person he was seeking had shown himself.

Goz: “So the Count Pendleton has come in person.”

Jorah: “I am, even so, a mere scrap of an imperial noble. Leaving it to my subordinates and waiting, trembling in the rear, would reflect poorly on me—though perhaps the place I am trembling is merely different.”

So saying, the man with a stiff, twisted smile upon his face was indeed Jorah Pendleton himself.

And seeing Jorah come to the front line, Goz received an unexpected impression.

As far as Goz knew, Jorah had been an indecisive, conflict-averse, weak-kneed man. That such a man would show himself of his own accord on the field of battle like this—

Goz: “Has there been a change in your state of mind? I would like to hear what set it off, but…”

Jorah: “When threatened by one of the Nine Divine Generals, I feel as though I might tell anything. I… am a weak man. That is why I must constantly be rousing myself.”

Biting his lip, Jorah answered in a trembling voice. At his side, one of the soldiers serving him knelt and respectfully presented a sword. Jorah took it and slowly drew it from the scabbard.

Jorah Pendleton was not—so far as anyone had heard—any master of the blade.

He was plainly an amateur; not only was it form alone, even that form was not properly set.

Goz: “Even so, if you bear a weapon, I shall not go easy.”

Jorah: “Th-That is fine. From the moment I chose this path, I knew it would come to this… I have already taken my leave of my wife.”

Goz: “—Is that so. Then no more words are necessary.”

With that said, Goz gave a deep nod to Jorah, who looked straight at him. Then, gripping the tsuchihoko anew with force, he roused the soldiers around him and roared to crush the enemy.

Goz: “Goz Ralfon, one of the Nine Divine Generals! By His Excellency’s imperial command, I shall dispose of the seeds of calamity that would gnaw the Empire from within!”

Jorah: “Jorah Pendleton, Mid Count— for my wife’s sake, I will resist with these slender arms.”

5

Priscilla: “—That booming voice… so Goz Ralfon had come. Truly, what a lavish display just to capture me alone. Well, it is only natural, though.”

With a faint smile, the girl who boasted thus—Priscilla—swept nimbly through the forest.

Holding up the hem of her red dress, she traversed bad footing as if it were nothing; her figure, perhaps, approached that of a wildling for whom surviving amid great nature was a given.

However, apart from that carriage of hers, everything that made her up was the precise opposite of a wildling, and so it felt miraculous.

???: “…”

Behind her, at the manor she had left behind, her husband and his men were clashing with imperial soldiers. At the very last, the smile Jorah had shown Priscilla flickered across the backs of her eyelids. It flickered across her eyelids.

Priscilla: “—You have done well.”

He had not been a man with much to recommend him.

Measured against the Vollachian Empire's creed, he was wholly unfit; as an imperial noble and as a man, he lacked much. —Yet in that final moment, he was indeed Priscilla's husband.

He took his wife's feelings into account and, sacrificing himself, secured time and a line of retreat. To snort at such merits and efforts would be a base act of character; she could not, and would not, permit it.

Harboring such sentiments, Priscilla ran through the forest as if flying—

???: "—That is far enough, Princess."

Priscilla: "…"

At the voice thrown at her unawares, Priscilla's feet, moving through the forest, came to a stop.

Thus halted, Priscilla's crimson eyes looked overhead. Then, from where her gaze fell, a figure dropped from atop a great tree to right before her.

It was a girl with only thin cloth wrapped around her body, a revealing outfit. Her age was not so different from Priscilla's—early in her teens. Healthy, but with a figure still too lacking in curves to be called provocative; she was marked by drowsy round eyes, short silver hair with a single lock of red, and the canine ears peculiar to dog-people.

In her hand, the girl gripped a slender branch as long as she was tall; after she stared at the Priscilla before her, her lips trembled,

???: "…Lady Prisca."

—so she addressed Priscilla.

Priscilla: "I see. That it should be you who stands in my way at this juncture… how ironic."

???: “I… was told… by Lord Vincent…”

Priscilla: “Your manner of address is wrong. My elder brother already holds the station to be called His Excellency. If you are one of the Empire’s soldiers, know your place. Ah, and—”

There she paused once, and Priscilla gently folded her arms. Then, with long, narrow eyes she fixed her opponent, and she loosened her lips.

Priscilla: “As I am now, I am Priscilla. If I am to honor my husband’s final service, then I am Priscilla Pendleton. Do not, by any means, mistake it, Arakiya.”

Arakiya: “Pri… scilla…?”

Priscilla: “Prisca Benedict is dead. Otherwise, that would be inconvenient, would it not? For my part, even this is meant as a concession to my brother.”

Winking one eye, Priscilla snorted at the girl before her—the opponent she had named Arakiya.

At Priscilla’s words, Arakiya put strength into her small shoulders,

Arakiya: “Whether Prisca or Priscilla… the Princess is the Princess. Come with me. Lord Vincent… His Excellency will hear you out. So…”

Priscilla: “You would have me surrender? You, as my milk-sister, should know this as well. This personage will never submit to anyone. Much less, to my brother? That my brother would pardon me?”

Arakiya: “…Is that wrong?”

Priscilla: “No. A grave mistake. Honeyed words from my brother—no, my brother would not speak mere palliatives. You only interpreted his words into the shape you wished. That my brother ordered you lot to seize me was, in his way, an affection.”

Arakiya: “Affection…?”

Arakiya only traced Priscilla's words, and to that, Priscilla nodded.

Priscilla: "Of course, affection. My brother loves me. I, too, have due feeling for my brother. However, that and our stations are separate matters. —My brother must kill this personage. Therefore,"

Arakiya: "—!"

As she spoke and briefly lowered her tone, Arakiya's eyes flew wide. In the same instant, Arakiya's small body sprang far back. The reason was plain—a crimson flash.

A lateral sweep, a beautiful yet vicious slash, traced exactly where Arakiya's neck had been; her head had all but been seared off.

What had wrought it was the crimson treasure sword that, before anyone realized it, had been born into Priscilla's hand—

Arakiya: "Yang Sword Vollachia…"

Priscilla: "Whether one has this or not makes the difference in the Vollachian Emperor's authority. Though I think my brother no longer needs such a musty symbol of authority… Berstetz and the like will be noisy about it. If you would ward off that nagging, you have no choice but to pluck out this personage's life. Now, what will you do?"

Leveling the treasure sword called Yang Sword, Priscilla demanded Arakiya's resolve.

For a girl whose limbs had yet to finish stretching out, that treasure sword was large and far too valiant. But Priscilla brimmed with confidence to wield it at will; in fact, she would make that a reality.

Facing that Priscilla, Arakiya spent a time of contemplation that seemed long yet short—

Arakiya: "—Go, Princess."

Then Arakiya slowly lowered the staff clutched in both hands. Seeing this, Priscilla wore a taken-aback look and, Priscilla: “That should be an act of defiance against the Emperor’s edict, no?”

Arakiya: “…My Princess is my Princess. But if Lady Prisca is dead… then this is the last time. Please, do not stand out anymore. Things like spectating gladiator fights…”

Priscilla: “Even without that, my whereabouts would have been known. That is why I purposely gave you the pretext from my side. Well, it is true I imposed upon my husband.”

Knowing that pursuers would be set on her, Priscilla had invited Jorah to spectate Gladiator Island. As a result, that had invited today’s raid, but there was little difference between sooner or later.

Rather, because that had happened, Priscilla had, for the first time, been able to turn her eyes to her first husband.

Priscilla: “Arakiya, you have done well. Next time you meet this personage, have your heart decided.”

Arakiya: “…I do not want to see you anymore.”

Priscilla: “But it will not be so. At least, that is what I believe.”

Saying only that, Priscilla narrowed her eyes. And at the same time, from beyond the forest—from the direction of the manor Priscilla had fled—there resounded a violent, explosion-like sound.

No doubt some manner of resolution had been reached. Arakiya’s awareness turned that way for but an instant and immediately returned forward. However—

Arakiya: “—Princess.”

When she faced forward again, Priscilla’s figure was no longer there. She let her gaze wander about, but she was not so careless a person as to be found that way.

Such was Arakiya’s milk-sister, and the only sibling sharing blood with the Vollachian Emperor—

Arakiya: “Please, so…”

She fervently wished that somewhere far away—as far away as possible—she would live out her life.

She wanted her to forget the Empire’s harsh succession struggle and to live, far away, simply as a single girl.

But contrary to such a wish, Arakiya knew.

Arakiya: “—Absolutely impossible.”

She—Prisca Benedict—would not permit such a way of life.

Inevitably, a day would surely come when, like today, she would face her again. When that happened, just what could she do against Priscilla = Prisca?

She had been told to have her heart decided. She had been told, but —

Arakiya: “…Lady Prisca, you fool.”

For now, at least, that was all she could manage to murmur.

6

—The national treason scheme plotted by Mid Count Jorah Pendleton ended in failure.

The Mid Count who had been the ringleader was slain by the Empire’s General First-Class, Goz Ralfon, and one could say he became the first cornerstone of the new control established by Vincent Vollachia, who had ascended to the imperial throne.

The Mid Count had no blood relatives, and as a result, the Pendleton house, which had continued for generations, was abolished. This was finalized by the suicide of his younger wife, who had entered into an affinal relationship with the Mid Count only a month before.

Regretting her husband’s deeds, the still-young lady took her own life. —This is corroborated by the testimony of Arakiya, who would later become one of the Vollachian Empire’s Nine Divine Generals.

Therefore, there were no fugitives. —The sun did not grow dim and continued to exist even now.

Chapter 2:
Bonds of Ice / Seven Years Ago / Anastasia Camp

1

—On that day, a single company let out its first cry in the Kararagi City-States.

Its place was a corner of the Second City, Banan, and though one would not go so far as to call the building a hovel, it was hardly the sort of fine structure that deserved such praise; that was the office this company used.

On the western side of the world map, the Kararagi City-States were by no means a land blessed with “resources.” For that reason, commerce had flourished there since long ago, and merchants held such high status that other countries even derided it as a “business nation.”

Because of that national character, everyone sought the chance for a dramatic reversal, dreaming of rising by relying on their own mercantile talent, and so new companies springing up was nothing unusual. As was customary, most were devoured by renowned firms that already had firm footholds, and failed to leave any results.

However, on this day, the one who announced themselves in that survival-of-the-fittest world of traders was neither someone carried away by the opportunity before their eyes, nor someone overconfident in their own business acumen.

—To begin with, that person did not even dream of rising as a merchant.

For with meticulous planning and feasible preparations already in place, it was not a matter of realizing some pipe dream, but nothing more than a proper business plan.

And so, the very person who would achieve her aim by placing utmost importance on planning—

???: “Ah! Aaah! Hey, hey, old man! Look proper, would ya!”

A girl’s high, almost scream-like voice echoed across the blue sky.

Shifting one’s gaze from the blue sky to the ground, the one raising her voice was a figure in a kimono.

Her long, wavy, pale-violet hair flowed down her back, and she wore a gaudy kimono to perfection. It was a little warm for the season, but such obstacles were trifles before fashion.

She was a girl with round, sparkling teal eyes and adorably well-proportioned features. Only now, those eyes were sharp, and her lovely face was painted over with displeasure.

With her face entirely dyed in that discontent, the girl stamped the ground firmly, and—

???: “What the heck, geez! Why’re ya always so rough? We’ve known each other a long time, old man, but I reaaally don’t get that part of ya at all.”

Beastman: “What’s with ya— why d’ya gotta run me down that much! Does it bug ya that bad? Even if it’s just a tad crooked, ain’t nobody gonna care!”

???: “Not “nobody”— I’m already bothered by it right here! Geez!”

Cheeks puffed out in protest, the girl’s name was Anastasia Hoshin. At the tender age of fifteen, she stood as the head of her own domain, the representative of the Hoshin Company.

And the one being glared at by Anastasia, pulling a bitter face, was a dog-faced beastman more than two heads taller than her petite self, his whole body covered in dark-brown fur.

Mouth wide as he looked back to answer Anastasia’s protest, the beastman’s hands reached up to just above the building’s entrance, where there was a sign bearing the name “Hoshin Company.” As one could see, they were right in the middle of putting up the sign, an auspicious moment for the company’s opening—

Anastasia: “Starting out with the sign tilted is bad luck! Make it, make it proper!”

Beastman: “Alright, alright, ya noisy little thing. That Ana-bo sure got mighty important. Feels real moving for me too, y’know.”

Anastasia: “That! And quit it already with callin’ me “Ana-bo”!”

Following her instructions, the beastman made fine adjustments to the tilted sign, and Anastasia jabbed a finger at him. When the beastman rumbled “Huh?” in his throat, Anastasia’s eyes flashed as she continued,

Anastasia: “Listen, starting today I’m officially standing on my own two feet as a merchant, right? If people keep callin’ me with some kiddy nickname forever, it won’t look cool at all.”

Beastman: “Even so, ya been Ana-bo for sooo long. When ya still look so teensy, complainin’ ya hate bein’ treated like a kid~ ain’t very persuasive.”

Anastasia: “Sayin’ I look teensy is uncalled for! I’m still gonna grow, proper!”

Beastman: “Are ya, now?”

Blushing bright red, Anastasia drew a doubtful look from the beastman.

In truth, at fifteen an ordinary human girl’s body would have been fairly developed, but Anastasia’s growth lagged remarkably behind others. Her height was on the short side, and her curves were much too scant. Even so, those who looked upon her felt some hint of gloss in her beauty, something that must have arisen from the femininity emanating from her very essence. The white fox stole at her neck also adorned her beyond her years.

Of course, that feminine air of hers completely evaporated before the dog-faced beastman she had known so long, leaving her looking much like the girl she had been when they first met.

Beastman: “Anyhow, if not Ana-bo, what am I s’posed ta call ya? If ya wanna put on airs with a fresh mood, that's where ya gotta start."

Anastasia: "You? Callin' me…? Uh, um, that'd be…"

Beastman: "That'd be?"

Anastasia: "Y-You decide, old man! Anything but Ana-bo— and if it ain't cute, I don't want it."

Beastman: "Why ya puttin' such a troublesome shackle on me… Just got the collar off at long last, and all."

She averted her eyes, Anastasia's cheeks faintly flushed, and the beastman scratched at his own neck. Seeing that thick neck, Anastasia's lips curved in a slight, satisfied smile.

There was nothing conspicuous about the bare, dark-brown fur around his neck.

That very lack of a feature held great meaning.

Anastasia: "It's proof that you finally became mine, old man."

Beastman: "Sounds awful to the ear, that does… Well then, how 'bout you change how ya call me, too, Ana-bo?"

Anastasia: "Huh? Me too?"

Startled, Anastasia pointed to herself, and the beastman folded his thick arms with a "That's right."

Beastman: "Startin' today, you're a bigwig, and on top of that, I'm your property… If it's the start of a new life, it's the same for both of us. Can't have me doin' all the hard part."

Anastasia: "Mmm~ that's true… maybe? Then, as for you, old man…"

So prompted, Anastasia thought for a while. Then, looking up timidly at the giant in front of her with her teal eyes, her thin lips trembling, Anastasia: “C-Can I call ya Ricardo… without any honorifics?”

Beastman: “Ain’t that fine? Yeah, that kinda thing’s got some bluff to it and sounds good. Though, well, bein’ called that by you, Anabo, makes me itch, I’ll tell ya.”

Anastasia: “…Then, what’ll you call me?”

At Anastasia’s question, the beastman—Ricardo looked up with a “Let’s see,” then, after uncrossing his arms, carefully straightened the slightly tilted sign,

Ricardo: “Then it’ll be “Miss.” I’ll be callin’ ya that.”

Anastasia: “—. That’s just copyin’ Mimi and the others! Slackin’! You’re slackin’! Geez, old man… No! Ricardo, ya idiot! Lazybones!”

Ricardo: “Why’re ya gettin’ so grumpy over that? Can’t figure ya out.”

Saying so, Ricardo scratched his own head with a finger in exasperation. Brushed off with that all-too-familiar attitude, Anastasia puffed out her cheeks.

They had known each other a long time, and truly, he was a beastman who did not understand a maiden’s heart at all.

2

Anastasia: “Seriously, old man… when it comes to Ricardo, he’s dense as they come.”

Proprietress: “Hehe, that’s true. And at this point, that part of him might never change.”

Saying so, the proprietor of the familiar tavern softened her lips at Anastasia, who was sulking at the counter. What she quietly slid over to her was the fourth glass of milk of the day.

Taking the glass in hand, Anastasia drained it in one go. Her belly was about to start sloshing, but it still wasn’t enough to drink— or rather, it wasn’t enough to vent.

Her relationship with the tavern's proprietress, in fact, went back about as far as her relationship with Ricardo.

Originally, it was Ricardo who had picked up Anastasia when she was a vagrant from the slums, and it was the proprietress who had hired the girl— who had no backing at all— to do odd jobs. That's why, though the time had finally come for Anastasia to stand on her own as a merchant, this place could be called the origin where she learned everything.

For that very reason, she still frequented it as a regular even now. To Anastasia, who had no family, the proprietress was like a mother, or perhaps an older sister a few years her senior.

And then, as Anastasia kept on drinking milk, the proprietress let out a somewhat sentimental sigh and said, "Even so—"

Proprietress: "To think that Ana-chan is striking out on her own— time sure flies. It feels like we first met just yesterday… and you've become so womanly, Ana-chan."

Anastasia: "Well, I ain't gonna be a kid forever. But ya, proprietress, ain't changed one bit— and that ain't flattery. Say, ya doin' some sneaky, naughty thing to keep yer youth, ain't ya?"

Proprietress: "Even without doin' anything naughty, if I quietly borrow a little of the young folks' vitality, that's more than enough to stay young, y'know?"

Anastasia: "That sounds real serious-like, an' it's a little scary."

She gave a mischievous smile at the proprietress's joke, then wiped her mouth and stood up.

It was the end of Fire Time, with night about to draw near. The tavern's real business hours began when the craftsmen on their way home from work stopped in for a drink, so she didn't want to overstay and get in the way.

Proprietress: "You could always be our poster girl again, Ana-chan, y'know?"

Anastasia: “I reckon that wouldn’ be bad once in a while, but today’s a special day, so I’ll pass. As for me, though, I might be leanin’ on you ladies for a bit.”

Proprietress: “It’s you we’re talkin’ about— that’s just fine. …Stay strong, alright?”

Anastasia: “Mm, much obliged. It’s the first step toward my dream. Ain’t nothin’ I’m worried about.”

Leaving copper coins for the milk, Anastasia waved a smile to the proprietress. Then, sent off by her, she straightened her back in front of the shop.

Just then, as Anastasia stood there amidst a townscape turning the color of sunset—

???: “Ah, Miss, there you aaare! Boss was worried, so I’m suuuper glad we found ya!”

Along with that loud voice, a figure kicked up a cloud of dust as it ran up to her. From the voice alone she knew who it was, but turning that way, Anastasia narrowed her eyes.

Bounding up with brimming energy was a kitten beastman girl with orange fur. The girl didn’t slow down at all as she charged straight at them, and Anastasia’s smile deepened as she said—

Anastasia: “Watch it.”

???: “Gyahhh!”

Right beside the lightly sidestepping Anastasia, the girl barreled straight into the wall. The sound and impact that spread around made one worry in spite of oneself—

???: “Ahahaha! That was a huge wham! It suuuper hurts! Hurts!”

Seeing the girl sprawled on the ground, arms and legs flailing as she howled with laughter, that worry evaporated. Anastasia shrugged her shoulders in exasperation and gently held out a hand to the girl.

???: “Oh?”

Anastasia: ““Oh?” ain’t what ya say. C’mon, take my hand an’ stand proper. I went ’n dressed ya up in such a pretty outfit, an’ now look — ya got it all muddy.”

???: “’Kay! Got iiit— Whatever my lady’s heart desires!”

Anastasia: “Where d’ya even learn that kinda thing… honestly.”

With a wry smile, Anastasia hauled up the girl who’d grabbed her hand. The girl, light enough to spring as she rose, had the dirt on her body brushed off by Anastasia.

Even smaller than the petite Anastasia, the girl was a beastman from the so-called kittenfolk, a race whose people were short in stature. Her adorable face and fluffy coat were the absolute best in Anastasia’s book, and this girl in particular, with her friendliness, was impossible to take her eyes off.

Her name was Mimi, and she was one of Anastasia’s precious “assets.”

Anastasia: “So then, Mimi? Ya were lookin’ for me?”

Mimi: “Oh, yeah-yeah! Like, Boss said he made Miss mad— and if he went lookin’ himself, you’d get, like, super mad, so he was all, “Fix it with Mimi’s cuteness, pleaase!” kinda thing!”

Anastasia: “There he goes again, stickin’ his nose where it don’t belong. He’s losin’ my good mood ’cause he ain’t comin’ to look himself in the first place… Hmph, don’t care no more!”

Mimi: “Yeah, don’t care, don’t care! Boss is a dooork!”

Anastasia: “That’s right— Ricardo’s a dooork!”

In unison, Anastasia and Mimi happily vented their anger at Ricardo. Of course, Mimi was only matching Anastasia’s mood, but that didn’t matter.

Passersby glanced sidelong at the boisterous girls with indulgent smiles. Basking in those looks, Anastasia kicked a pebble at her feet.

Anastasia: “If that’s the case, I don’t care about Ricardo no more. Mimi, will ya tag along with me on my greeting rounds?”

Mimi: “Leeeave it to me! So, so, what’s a greetin’ rounds?”

Anastasia: “Heheh— glad ya asked. I been talkin’ ’bout it for a while, right? I finally opened my own shop. So I gotta go give our greetings to our valued customers.”

Mimi: “Ah! Mimi knows that— a raid!”

Anastasia: “Well, might be kinda similar, maybe.”

Patting Mimi’s head as she showed off slightly mistaken knowledge, Anastasia started down the street. Keeping pace beside her, Mimi rolled her round eyes as if to say, “Huh? That ain’t it?”

Anastasia: “Today’s goal is to show our faces to our regulars, and ask ’em to keep treatin’ us well from here on. So it’s fine if they just remember our cute faces— mine ’n Mimi’s.”

Mimi: “Ooh, Mimi gets that— Mimi and Miss are suuuper cute.”

Anastasia: “That’s right, suuuper cute.”

Hand in hand with quick-on-the-uptake Mimi, Anastasia turned her gaze toward their destination. For the time being, the first person she ought to greet was both a business rival and a benefactor.

Anastasia: “I’ve been nothin’ but indebted to Chuden-san, but I gotta make sure I don’t do anything like kickin’ dirt with my hind legs as I leave, y’hear.”

Just as Anastasia was muttering that in such a mood—

Gentleman: “—My apologies, young lady. Might you know of a Mr. Chuden?”

Anastasia: “Hm?”

Addressed suddenly from the side, Anastasia turned with Mimi. The one who had spoken to her was a gentlemanly man with a mustache.

He was well dressed, with a neat hairstyle and a refined bearing—and above all, his attire was not wafuku but foreign-styled, so it was immediately clear he was from another country. There were those in Kararagi who intentionally favored foreign fashion, but his speech that did not use the Kararagi dialect felt natural.

More or less grasping that at a glance, Anastasia tilted her head.

Anastasia: “If it’s Chuden-san, he’s my former employer… An’ you are?”

Gentleman: “Oh, that is most helpful. I have come to negotiate business with Mr. Chuden. It is my first visit to Kararagi, and I was out walking from curiosity, but…”

Anastasia: “Did ya, whoops, get yerself lost?”

Gentleman: “Hahaha, that is precisely it. Quite embarrassing.”

At Anastasia’s question, the gentleman touched his mustache, even his laughter refined. Seeing that reaction, Mimi also threw both hands up and said—

Mimi: “Mimi sooo gets that! Mimi gets totally lost even in her birth home! Lost every day!”

Gentleman: “For such an adorable young lady, that must be endlessly worrisome. If you would permit it, might I ask your names as a token of acquaintance?”

Mimi: “Mm— Mimi is Mimi, and this here’s Miss!”

Anastasia, side-eyeing overly friendly Mimi, cast a glance to gauge the gentleman’s expression. Meeting that look, the gentleman dipped his chin.

Gentleman: “My apologies. I am Juukulius— Alviero Juukulius. I am a foreigner hailing from a country farther to the east than here.

I would be most grateful if you could soothe my loneliness."

Anastasia: "…Yer tongue's real smooth, ain't it. I'm Anastasia Hoshin."

Alviero: "Hoshin? As in the same Hoshin as "Hoshin of the Wilderness," the founding hero of the Kararagi City-States?"

Hearing Anastasia's name, the gentleman— Alviero— widened his yellow eyes. At his words, Anastasia's teal eyes also opened slightly in surprise.

Anastasia: "Huh, ya know that well. Oh, but don't get the wrong idea, okay? I ain't got nothin' to do with that Hoshin. I just took the name, is all."

Alviero: "Ho, took the name? That is quite bold. "Hoshin of the Wilderness" is synonymous with rising from nothing. To declare that name in this meritocracy of Kararagi means…"

Anastasia: "It's proof I'm pickin' a fight with everyone around me without makin' excuses."

Alviero: "…I see— astute."

Fingers still at his mustache, Alviero offered that praise in a slightly lower voice. Seeing his narrowed eyes, Anastasia realized she was being appraised.

However, it did not feel like an indiscreet, ill-mannered gaze, but rather like that of an appraiser seeking to ascertain the other's mettle.

Accepting the intent of that look, Alviero said "Forgive me," and apologized as if ashamed of his own demeanor.

Alviero: "I am ashamed to have cast an impolite gaze upon a lady. —Tell me, young lady who borrows the name of "Hoshin of the Wilderness," what is it you intend to become?"

Anastasia: "Lemme see. First, the top merchant in Banan. Then after that, number one in Kararagi, an' finally…"

Alviero: “Finally?”

Anastasia: “—I’ll become a big enough person that my name’ll take the place of Hoshin’s.”

With a crooked grin, Anastasia squarely shot her mouth off at Alviero.

To some listeners, it was the sort of line that would be laughed off as the height of arrogance and bombast. However—

Anastasia did not hesitate to assert this, no matter who she faced.

There’s no reason for anyone’s dreams to be mocked.

And the gentleman before her did not laugh at Anastasia’s dream.

Alviero: “Then it seems I have had a good encounter. I am a knight of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica. I cannot travel here frequently, but if the chance arises, I would very much like to speak with you of trade.”

Anastasia: “Then I’ll hafta study up plenty from a future patron, won’t I? Make sure ya remember— Hoshin Company starts up today, right this very day.”

Alviero: “I shall keep it in mind.”

With a faint smile, Alviero offered a dignified bow right there. From that refined gesture alone, Anastasia could tell at a glance that he was of a first-rate lineage as a knight.

Watching his back as he strode off smartly, Anastasia quietly stroked her slender chest.

She hadn’t exactly been nervous, but it felt like a meaningful meeting for her as well. Of course, it wasn’t as if this would immediately connect to the future, but—

Anastasia: “Whatever the talk is, I gotta make it mine with my own hands.”

From here on, Anastasia would have to shoulder many things and do business.

More than ever, she would have to be sensitive to everything, and treat every matter with care. That was a way of thinking that applied to everything— time, meetings, and human ties alike.

Mimi: “Hey, heeey, Miss.”

As Mimi tugged at Anastasia’s sleeve and called to her in her carefree way, Anastasia looked her way, wondering if she’d sulked at being ignored.

Then Mimi pointed at the gentleman’s retreating back.

Mimi: “Wasn’t that old guy lost? Is he okay now?”

Anastasia: “Ah.”

Remembering the very start of this whole thing, Anastasia gaped. Then she hurriedly patter-pattered after Alviero’s back, which had unhesitatingly gotten itself lost again.

3

By the time their rounds of greetings were over, night had completely fallen all around.

Anastasia: “Mmm~, it dragged on longer than I thought. Mimi, thanks for taggin’ along.”

Mimi: “No probleeem! Mimi was told Mimi hasta take real good care of Miss, so Mimi’s the Boss’s stand-in! Mission suuuper accomplished!”

Just as they stepped out of the last place they’d visited on their greeting rounds, Mimi bounced as she answered Anastasia’s words of thanks.

Wherever she went, the free-spirited Mimi was basically liked by everyone. As a result, it honestly felt like she’d been received much more favorably than if she’d gone around with Ricardo in tow.

That said—

Anastasia: “Folks bein’ friendly is ‘cause they ain’t thinkin’ I’m an enemy.”

Mimi: “Huh— is that so? But Miss went alllll out pickin’ fights, right?”

Anastasia: “Maybe they reckon it’s best to act all composed, like proper grown-ups. If that’s the case, I’ll make ’em regret later that they took me too lightly. Till then, if they keep thinkin’ I’m just cute-smilin’ little Anastasia-chan, that’s my win.”

Mimi: “Deyahahahaha!”

Mimi burst out laughing as Anastasia put a finger to her cheek and made a smile.

She hadn’t expected to be laughed at quite that much, but since malice simply didn’t exist in Mimi, Anastasia filed it away as pure, honest amusement.

Probably only about half of the people they’d called on had taken Anastasia’s greetings seriously today. In the end, it was just the say-so of a fifteen-year-old slip of a girl.

Even the great merchants of Banan—one of the ten major cities of the Kararagi City-States—couldn’t so easily see through to Anastasia’s qualities. Or perhaps they had, and had decided that she wasn’t their enemy; that possibility was high enough as well.

If that was how it was, then that was interesting in its own right—so thought Anastasia.

Mimi: “—? Miss, ya look kinda happy?”

Anastasia: “Heheh— ya can tell? I shoulda had a bit of worry an’ nerves, and yet… honestly, I’m gettin’ so excited I can hardly stand it.”

Mimi: “Ohhh, then the future’s lookin’ briiight.”

How far she truly understood was unclear, but Mimi's words were straightforward and seeped right in.

Anastasia relaxed her lips and patted the head of the cute "asset" walking right beside her. As she did, Mimi, eyes narrowing at the pat, let out an "Ah," and—

Mimi: "Hetaro 'n the others— and Boss!"

Anastasia: "Huh?"

Following the finger Mimi pointed straight ahead, Anastasia lifted her face and saw a large silhouette standing on the road home before them. It was a giant big enough to make one look up, and on his shoulders sat two kittenfolk boys who looked just like Mimi— Hetaro and Tivey, Mimi's younger brothers of the triplets.

The one standing there with the two perched on his shoulders was none other than that heartless grown-up, Ricardo.

Hetaro: "Sis! Great— we didn't miss ya in passing!"

Tivey: "It was good we asked Miss about today's plans beforehand. If we hadn't, we definitely would've missed each other somewhere weird, yes."

At their sister's call, Hetaro and Tivey exchanged a glance and hopped down from Ricardo's shoulders.

Landing lightly, the two scurried over to Mimi with quick steps.

Mimi: "What're you two doin' here? Were ya lonely without Mimi? Aww, you two are such helpless lil' guys!"

Hetaro: "Eh? Uh, uh, Sis— y-yeah, that too, but…"

Tivey: "That is incorrect. It simply got dark, so we were worried about you both. The only one who almost cries when separated from Sis is big bro."

At Mimi's breezy smile, Hetaro and Tivey showed opposite reactions.

It was the difference in temperament between Hetaro, who put his sister above all else, and Tivey, who “merely” remained extremely devoted to family. Their true feelings were clearly in agreement, so it wasn’t something to fuss over.

And while they watched the heartwarming exchange among the three siblings out of the corner of their eye—

Anastasia: “And you too, Ricardo— what’d ya come for?”

Ricardo: “Don’t say it with thorns like that, Ana-bo. I only got worried ‘bout whether Mimi’d be fine without me taggin’ along… and, well, the proprietress scolded me.”

Anastasia: “The proprietress?”

Ricardo: “Said if my laissez-faire goes too far, I’ll be given up on sooner or later…”

“I see,” Anastasia thought, feeling complicated about the fact that the proprietress had given advice. Of course, gratitude outweighed everything, but there was also irritation at Ricardo needing that to get moving.

Come to think of it, it had been over six years since she’d met Ricardo, and more times than she could count, he’d made her fret like this— even now, after she’d torn off his slave collar.

Anastasia: “Ricardo… old man, do ya regret becomin’ mine?”

Ricardo: “Hah? Where’d that come from all of a sudden?”

Anastasia: “Just answer!”

Frowning, Ricardo got glared at from below by Anastasia’s upturned eyes. Watched over by the three siblings, he roughly scratched his own head and—

Ricardo: “I’ve regretted bein’ with ya more times than I can count.”

Anastasia: “…R-Really?”

Ricardo: “Sure have. Maybe it’s my way of sayin’ things, but ya were a girl who wouldn’t listen one bit. Got yourself in danger over ’n over, worried me over ’n over. Seriously, my lifespan kept shrinkin’ and shrinkin’.”

Letting out a long, deep breath, Ricardo grumbled as he looked back on things. Those honest words of his resounded heavy and booming inside Anastasia’s skull.

She’d braced herself to hear whatever might be said, but when she actually heard it, it hit harder than she’d expected. For a moment she even felt like running away; she didn’t, only because today was the day she’d decided she had to become one step stronger—her day of striking out on her own.

And then, upon the head of the Anastasia who didn’t run, a big palm was suddenly laid.

Anastasia: “—Ah.”

Ricardo: “After yankin’ my life up ’n down this much, it’s a little late, ain’t it? Do whatever ya want with my life, as much as ya like. Long since, I’ve been yours, Ana-bo.”

Anastasia: “…But, old man, you’ve always said you didn’t feel like you’d become mine.”

Ricardo: “Then I’ll go ’round spreadin’ it from today. From today I’ll go ’round spreadin’ it. How ’bout I slap on a collar with Ana-bo’s name on it?”

At Ricardo’s joking tone, Anastasia caught her breath. Then, timidly, she clutched with both hands the big hand resting on her head—

Anastasia: “…Not Ana-bo— it’s Miss, right? ’Cause you’re my Ricardo.”

Ricardo: “That’s right, Miss. From here on out, I’m countin’ on a long, long road together.”

Anastasia: “Mm. I’m gonna work ya hard, so get good ’n ready!”

Taking the hand off her head, she squeezed it, and Anastasia smiled at Ricardo. Seeing the girl's smile, Ricardo also opened his big mouth and laughed.

At the sight of the two of them, Mimi and her brothers traded looks.

Mimi: "Dunno what's goin' on, but Miss and Boss look suuuper happy, so Mimi is over the moooon!"

Anastasia: "Yeah, yeah, thanks. —Alright then, let's all head home and have dinner."

Mimi: "Okaaay! Yayyy! Mimi wants Daisukiyaki!"

Everyone laughed at the hopping Mimi, and Anastasia and the others set off walking.

The Hoshin Company was still tiny and had only just begun— even so, with the resolve to go straight on without hesitation, the future great merchant set out for home.

—And as the five shadowy silhouettes walked hand in hand side by side, she thought people would call that "family."

Chapter 3:
Bonds of Ice / Seven Years Ago / Felt Camp

1

—Things had gotten bad, Felt made a bitter face while being hung upside down.

Man: “You brats sure went and did something real stupid, didn’t ya.”

Felt: “…”

Man: “You pick a fight with adults and thought you could win? If so, that ain’t just naive. I’d love to see your idiot parents’ faces.”

A vile face that looked like crudeness and violence all mixed together.

Having a bald-headed man with a scar on his face breathe his fishy breath on her, Felt frowned all the more.

Of course the fishy breath was a problem, but the man’s words were even more so.

Felt: “I think the exact same thing.”

Man: “Hah?”

Felt: “If I could see my own shitty parents’ faces, I’d like to see ’em too. If I ever do see ’em, though, I’ll settle the score before you lot do.”

Man: “…”

Feeling the blood rush to her head from being upside down, Felt declared that with spite. Hearing it, the man before her gaped in astonishment.

Before long, the man slowly turned his head and met the eyes of the other men around him, and—

Man: “Da—hahahahaha!!”

With spittle flying, the men mocked Felt’s bold talk to their hearts’ content. Their laughter looked down on the little girl in filthy clothes insisting on her empty bravado, and jeered.

There is no salvation in the act of looking down on others.

Speaking only of appearances, the men’s outfits were, in their shabbiness, a fair match for Felt’s. Even so, there is always someone lower. People cannot win against the sweet temptation of looking down on others.

Man: “Hee-Hee, you really gave me a laugh there, brat. I was pissed that your pals ran off on ya, but now I’m feelin’ a lot better.”

Felt: “…Those guys ain’t my friends.”

Man: “’Course they ain’t! They left you behind and dumped you! Even if they were your friends, cut ties. Well, either way, you ain’t ever gonna see ’em again.”

To Felt, who had let that slip out weakly and bitterly, the man declared it with a lingering hint of a grin.

Whether those words were advice, or just a plain old sneer—Felt, with the blood flow to her head becoming a serious problem, could not quite judge.

In any case—

Felt: “…Things have gotten bad.”

Looking back anew on the situation she was in, Felt muttered that like a curse.

The beginning of it all had been half a day earlier, caused by a shouting match that had erupted between Felt and her guardian.

Felt: “Rom-ji, you idiot! I do not care anymore!”

A shrill shout rang through the slum’s overcast sky, and a small figure darted swiftly down the alley.

With short blonde hair streaming and red eyes peeking behind her, it was the young girl, Felt.

She was not quite like the wind, but her steps were, compared to boys and girls of her age, exceptionally fast. Seven years old. Athletic ability and quick wits promised an excellent future.

Rom: “W-Wait, Felt! Will you not, at last, listen to an old man!”

And behind that child brimming with promise, a hulking figure with several times her build gave chase. Judging by the messed-up face and the bald head, he was an old man that made one want to add nearly tenfold to her age. Compared to the girl, the mountain-like bulk was continually toyed with by the nimble fugitive.

The name of the old man, out of breath and drenched in sweat, was Rom—someone like a guardian to Felt, living in the slums. Of course, there was no blood relation between them, and even as a guardian, they did not live together.

Even so, if one asked from whom Felt learned the basics of life, she could assert with pride that it was from Rom. She and Rom were that kind of pair.

At any rate, though they had such a relationship, now Felt was making use of her lightness, running on top of walls, on rooftops, using cats’ paths, cleverly evading Rom.

As to why it had come to this—

Rom: “When will you feel like obeying what I tell you! I told you not to eat mushrooms with red spots because they are dangerous! Before long your guts will rot from the bottom and you will die!”

Felt: “I told you I had a mouse gnaw them to check whether they were safe or not! Anyway, your stomach is way too weak, Rom-ji! If you die to mushrooms, how are you supposed to live!”

Rom: “I am saying it because there are those who have died!”

Clambering lightly up onto a roof, Felt continued a stare-down with Rom below.

The cause of this chase and argument lay in the meal Felt had prepared for Rom. Recently, over a small matter, Rom had taken ill, so Felt, with her daily gratitude, had served a mushroom dish.

But regarding the mushrooms gathered as ingredients, an objection came from Rom. Certainly, among the mushrooms that grow in the slums’ shade, there are many with strong toxicity. However, so that such things did not get mixed in by mistake, Felt had properly performed the selection of mushrooms.

Then, this time, her method of selection was nitpicked, and Felt’s anger reached its limit. And she ran away from Rom as he began his scolding, which brings us to now.

Felt: “Anyway, what happened to all that “my head hurts” and “my body feels heavy”! If you can chase me around this lively, were you lying!”

Rom: “Fool! I am scraping away at my little strength to come lecture you! Otherwise… ugh?!”

In the middle of the argument, Rom let out a pained groan and fell to his knees on the spot. Seeing that, Felt, for an instant, started to run over with, “Rom-ji?!” but—

Rom: “G-Gwooo…!”

Immediately after, a stomach noise so strong it could have been thunder resounded, and it became clear that the reason Rom fell to his knees lay with the mushrooms. In other words, he was merely suffering from diarrhea.

Felt: “Tch, what the hell, making me worry. Rom-ji, you idiot! Just stay there and rest!”

Rom: “W-Wait, Felt… do not go… guuuh!”

Shelving the fact that the cause of the stomachache was herself, Felt stuck out her tongue and turned her back on Rom. Rom reached out a hand toward that back, but unfortunately, he could not move a single step.

Just like that, Felt, literally as if flying, was gone from before Rom.

Felt: "…If I have run this far, am I safe now."

After running at full speed for a while, Felt wiped her brow as she checked her surroundings.

Frankly, although a good portion of it had been buying and selling barbs, given Felt's personality, honestly apologizing to Rom was painful. In the first place, since the motive for the mushroom dish had been the result of worrying about the listless Rom, from an onlooker's perspective it was far too fruitless a quarrel.

That said, to the parties involved, any quarrel is a quarrel, so it was not as if she could now go back and make up. And, with that mood, as Felt jumped down from the wall—

Boy: "—Yo, blondie over there."

Felt: "…"

As she landed and crouched, an impertinent voice called out. Even Felt would not take it in the twisted way of thinking that being called "blondie" here referred to someone other than herself.

When she turned toward the voice, she saw a boy just sticking his face out from the alley—a person, three or four years older than Felt, in shabby clothes. A face she had seen several times in the slums.

She did not know the name, but he was probably a parentless orphan like Felt.

Felt: "What do you want with me."

Boy: "Do not be so prickly. You jump around, and you are amazing. I had my eye on you for a while."

Felt: “Had your eye on me? On me?”

Boy: “Yeah, yeah. Will you become one of us?”

Saying that, the boy with short-cropped blue hair held out his hand to Felt. Looking at that outstretched hand, Felt tilted her head with, “One of you?”

Felt: “One of you, you are alone.”

Boy: “They are not here. We are getting ready now. There is a shabby tavern near here, right? The bunch that use it as their hangout are going to attack a rich man’s dragon carriage.”

Felt: “…You are telling me to join that.”

Boy: “No, no. Not that. When their theft succeeds, they will buy booze and such, right. Then, while they are drunk and sleeping, we will steal that from them. That is the idea.”

At the boy’s attitude that seemed to be saying, “Brilliant idea, right,” Felt narrowed her red eyes and pondered.

If it had been a plan to attack a rich man’s dragon carriage, even Felt would have refused. It could not possibly go well, and the danger was too great. However, if it was stealing from the culprits after the raid—

Felt: “They might be full of openings.”

Boy: “Oh, that is it! And we have to open things like the tavern’s lock, so we wanted someone nimble who can slip in through a window. How about you.”

Felt: “I have never done it, but…”

She thought her hands were on the dexterous side.

Basically, the way Felt made a living was either to steal things from people, or to pick up items thrown away in the slums or the commoners’ quarter and, together with Rom, fix and sell them.

She did not know how much of it was flattery, but Rom would sometimes praise those hands.

—And, if a bit of money in a lump came in, she could make Rom eat his words.

Felt: “There would no longer be any stomachs ruined by mushrooms, too.”

Boy: “—? What is “mushrooms.”“

Felt: “It is nothing. Tell me the plan properly.”

Waving her hand, cutting off the boy’s curiosity, Felt demanded the necessary explanation from him. Seeing Felt’s willing attitude, the boy rubbed under his nose with a finger.

And, jerking his chin as he indicated the alley behind him,

Boy: “All right. Then I will introduce you to the crew, so let us go. If it goes well, we are filthy rich.”

Felt: “It would be nice if it were that simple.”

Following the endlessly optimistic boy’s back, Felt herself also, somehow, was thinking less about anxiety over the plan and more about Rom’s surprised face when they succeeded—.

3

—Therefore, the facts that one of the companions made a huge noise and drew the attention of the dozing men, and that he pointed out where Felt, who had failed to flee in time, was and then ran off, were things Felt herself could avoid resenting by cursing her own lack of caution.

Man: “Filthy-looking brat… Well, if it’s a girl, there’s always ways to use her. Sell her off to a brothel, or we use her ourselves… though with a brat this small that’s impossible, huh!”

Still gripping the one leg of the captured Felt, the scar-faced man let out a vulgar laugh. Egged on, the men tilted nearby bottles and roared with good cheer.

She wanted somehow to writhe free of his hand, but the difference in strength between an adult and a little girl's leg power was hopeless. Other than neatly exploiting an opening, no means of escape came to mind.

Man: "Or how about you beg for it yourself? Might be you're better off with us than with those cold-blooded bastards?"

Boy: "Uh, um… about that kid…"

Man: "Hah?"

To the man who was offering a lifeline he did not mean at all, a timid-sounding voice spoke up. At that weak voice the man turned, and the boy at whom his gaze was directed trembled in the shoulders.

He was a tall, scrawny boy with a white cloth wrapped around his head. Amid men who looked every inch the thugs, the fine-boned boy somehow seemed out of place. In fact, he seemed to feel alien to the men as well, and with a forced smile he said:

Boy: "She will not fetch much money, and if roughing her up leaves a bad taste… then letting her go would, um, be fine, would it not…"

Man: "Hey, hey, hey hey hey, what's that. You givin' orders or something?"

Boy: "Ah, uh, no, that's not—! I didn't mean—"

Man: "Gaston! Don't be sayin' buzzkill stuff!"

The boy shook his hands and head, trying to explain himself to the thug's words. But faster than that, the thug who was holding Felt kicked, and caught the boy square in the solar plexus.

Driven in the chest by the hard toe, the boy coughed and toppled backward.

Boy: “Geh! Cough cough!”

Man: “Don’t get the wrong idea, Gaston. We’re letting you be with us on the basis that you’re our errand boy. If you suddenly act like you’re one of us, that’d be shocking, right?”

Gaston: “S-Sorry… I won’t do it again…”

Hands on the floor, the boy bowed his head and apologized desperately. Perhaps that sight satisfied the man’s sadism, for he grinned and turned his gaze back to Felt.

Man: “My bad, my bad. Our scrawny kid got the wrong idea. So, what were we talking about again?”

Felt: “…You forgot?”

Man: “Ahh, it was about whether to sell you or break you, right?”

Putting sudden strength into his arm, the man lifted Felt’s body up in front of his face. In the upside-down view, the man’s vicious mug came within arm’s reach.

At that fishy-breathed face, Felt drew in deep and blew her own breath back at him—

Felt: “—Your breath stings my eyes!”

At the very instant she barked that, Felt swung the knife she had secretly stolen from the man’s waist when he kicked the boy, and added one more scar to the man’s face.

Man: “G-Gaaaah?!”

Caught by an unexpected counterattack, the man clutched his face and recoiled. Naturally, Felt’s body was released; she spun a half turn in midair and landed like a cat on the floor. Just like that, without hesitation she also drove the knife into the top of the man’s foot, and on the return stroke cut the tendon at the back of his ankle.

Letting out a scream, the man toppled over. With this, one leg was useless. At the very least, he would not be able to chase Felt—or so she judged, but—

Thugs: “You little shit!”

Witnessing Felt’s brutal act, the men’s violence was ignited.

Forgetting they had been drinking, faces red with anger, the men surrounded Felt. Like that, knife in one hand, Felt was on the verge of steeling herself.

However, right then—

Voice: “—That’s far enough.”

With a tremendous roar, the door at the tavern’s entrance was blown inward from outside.

Thugs: “…”

What on earth, the men turned their stunned faces toward the shop entrance. What had been blown away was not only the door, but also the thug who had been on watch outside the shop.

The lookout had the whites of his eyes showing, sank with a thud, and was foaming at the mouth, unconscious.

And the someone who had done that slowly stepped into the tavern —

Felt: “So long!”

Man: “Ah?! That brat…!”

Paying no mind at all to the presence stepping in, the instant the men’s attention wavered, Felt slipped through the gaps between them and leapt out the window.

A hastily reaching hand grazed her waist, but could not catch her. Riding that momentum she neatly withdrew from the scene of carnage and burst into a run down the alley.

Felt: “Don’t know who the hell that was, but…”

No matter what they had done for her, she had no interest.

Ignoring whatever was happening in the tavern behind her, Felt ran away at full speed, nothing else on her mind.

4

And then—inside the tavern, right after the blonde girl burst out at full tilt.

Red-haired boy: “I was in the middle of looking for my father, but I happened to see some children fleeing with desperate looks on their faces. So I thought I’d ask to hear what happened…”

As he spoke, the blue-eyed boy gently brushed back his own red hair.

At the sight of that boy, the men were struck speechless—no, to be precise, only the man who’d been given a fresh wound on his face was screaming in pain.

Hearing that man’s groan, the red-haired boy knit his brows in sympathy,

Red-haired boy: “As for that person, I think you should take him to a clinic. It would have been nice if I could have used healing magic, but I have absolutely no talent for magic.”

Whether he was playing dumb or truly not seeing the situation at all, the boy’s attitude was aloof. As the thugs exchanged glances at that, the boy suddenly murmured, “Huh,” and—

Red-haired boy: “Are those crates over there yours? The mark on the boxes looks like a seal I’ve seen before.”

Thugs: “…”

Red-haired boy: “…I see. It seems you won’t listen nicely.”

The moment he mentioned the crates stacked in the corner of the tavern, the thugs' eyes changed. Sensing that keenly, the boy shook his head.

Then he moved on his own feet to stand before the entrance, and with his small body blocked the way.

Red-haired boy: "I recommend you surrender. —I am very bad at holding back."

Thus, with as much sincerity as possible, the boy tried to persuade the thugs.

The answer to that persuasion was simple and clear: each of them gripped his own weapon and, inch by inch, encircled the boy.

—The red-haired boy lowered his blue eyes and let out a short breath.

5

Waiting until things had cooled down and then returning to the tavern, Felt's eyes went wide in surprise.

Felt: "That is…"

Sneaking, lying flat on the roof of an abandoned house to peek at the tavern's state—of course she did so, because around the tavern there were many men who were probably guards.

They were carrying the unconscious thugs out from inside the tavern and tossing them onto the bed of a handcart. Since the slum's streets were not wide enough for dragon carriages to enter, for hauling loads they had to rely on handcarts.

It was not only the thugs being carried out; the crates that had been in the tavern—the target the men had stolen from the dragon carriage and that Felt and the others had been aiming for—seemed to be going along with them as well.

As expected, Felt held back an inward click of her tongue at how there had been no such convenient thing as those being overlooked, and she stared fixedly, waiting for the guards and the handcarts to leave.

In the middle of that—

Red-haired boy: "…"

Felt: "—!"

For just an instant she felt her eyes meet those of a short person who had come out of the tavern, and she shrank down. The red-haired person she had glimpsed for a moment kept their gaze aimed for a while toward where Felt was hiding, but was soon called by another guard and shifted their attention away.

After a little while like that, the figures and presences of the guards receded—

Felt: "They're gone, huh."

Climbing down from the roof, Felt peered into the problematic tavern.

It was a fairly spacious interior, but apparently there had been quite the brawl inside; compared to when Felt had last seen it, it looked much more ravaged. Since every one of those thugs had ended up in custody, there would no longer be anyone using this place as a hangout.

With a "good grief," Felt shrugged her shoulders and stepped out of the tavern. Then—

Felt: "—Ah."

Right in front of the entrance, her eyes met those of the boys peeking from a narrow alley. They were the lot who had left Felt behind and run off first.

All of them alike could not hide their surprise that Felt was unharmed. Alongside the relief there, something like guilt and remorse also peeked through, and—

Rom: "—Get lost already, you brats!!"

Boys: “W-Woaaaah—!!”

In the next instant, a shout loud enough to make the whole slum resound rang out, and the boys fled as if leaping away.

At the sight of the boys running off like startled rabbits, Felt’s eyes went round. Then, atop Felt’s head, a large palm she was used to feeling settled down.

Rom: “I did that because you did not look like you wanted to talk, but… was that meddling?”

Felt: “…Nah, you helped. It was, how do I put it, one of those complicated things.”

Rom: “What’s complicated about it. Do not get carried away, little girl.”

Saying that as he roughly patted Felt’s head was Old Man Rom. Casting a sidelong glance at the giant frame that had come to stand right beside her, Felt let out a long breath.

Felt: “They invited me, and I tried to steal valuables from the tavern thugs… but I blew it. They sold me out, and I was this close to dying.”

Rom: “You say the most outrageous things so offhandedly… In that case, did you want to get a bit of payback?”

Felt: “Payback, huh…”

At Rom’s testing way of putting it, Felt thought a little.

Felt: “The thugs stole goods from a rich man’s dragon carriage. Then we tried to steal valuables from the thugs, and since I was the newcomer and just right for it, they abandoned me. …Hey, Rom-ji, isn’t that super infuriating?”

Rom: “Infuriating, you say?”

Felt: “Both the ones who abandoned me and the ones they were targeting are weak and poor. Is there any story more unsalvageable than this? Cowards preying on cowards.”

In this story, the only ones who were well-off were the noble or merchant who had loaded the luggage onto the dragon carriage in the first place.

Even for that noble or merchant, in this city, in this country, they were not first or second in standing.

Those at the bottom snatching from those at the bottom, hurting each other because they could not help it. It was a ridiculous tale.

Felt: “So then, am I supposed to hurt them back and call that payback for what they did to me? That’s playing right into poverty’s hands. No way in hell.”

Rom: ““Playing into poverty’s hands,” you say the strangest things!”

Felt: “Hah? It’s not something to laugh at!”

Rom: “No, it is strange. Wahahahahaha!”

Stamping her feet, Felt, at the age of seven, bit into the absurdity of this world. Hearing Felt’s anger, Old Man Rom laughed from his throat, sounding truly delighted.

Then, having laughed heartily, Old Man Rom rubbed his bald head and looked back at the tavern behind them. The interior was in utter disarray, with many traces of bloodstains and damage, but—

Rom: “If we clean it and repair it… hmm, it may be just right as our castle.”

Felt: “…We’re going to live here?”

Rom: “It is about time the current ramshackle place reached its limit. This place is spacious. With it this large, it would be good to start some kind of business. Contrary to appearances, I have a broad network.”

Felt: “Well, your frame is about twice the size of a person’s, too.”

At what Felt said, Old Man Rom relaxed his cheeks in high spirits with a “You said it.” Seeing Rom looking like that, Felt too somehow had the churning in her chest subside.

Then, looking around the interior now in utter disarray, Felt narrowed one eye and—

Felt: “We’re gonna sell stuff and buy stuff or what. …If so, at first, same as always—things we fixed up from what we picked up, or selling stolen stuff?”

Rom: “That would be the easiest to realize. Yes, since it will be a place to sell found items and stolen items, one might say… Stolen Goods Warehouse.”

At Old Man Rom clapping his hands as if to say “brilliant idea,” Felt thought, “Isn’t there a better name?” but, catching sight of his bright expression out of the corner of her eye, she could not say anything.

Instead of saying anything, Felt turned her back on the empty tavern and looked out over the townscape.

The slum sinking into the sunset sky, its blazing red scene burned itself into her eyelids, and the things that had happened today, the thoughts she had drawn from what had happened today, she etched into her heart.

Felt: “If I’m going to take revenge, then I’ll take revenge on poverty. Watch me, poverty.”

—Someday I’ll make you bawl, she swore that to the sunset.

Chapter 4:
Bonds of Ice / Seven Years Ago / Crusch Camp

1

???: “Th-Th-Th-This is terrible, Ferris! Crusch and my elder brother might end up getting married! Wh-Wh-Wh-What should I do?!”

As always, Ferris wondered why this person could never calm down, watching the blond boy who had burst into the room.

Panting and in a fluster, the boy who appeared had blond hair, red eyes, and a neat face marked by little fangs at the corners of his mouth. He was still only thirteen years old; more than masculine gallantry or sternness, childish innocence overflowed from him, and he wore an air that naturally soothed people’s hearts.

That was no exception for Ferris—no, with Ferris it worked even more strongly. After all, Ferris was exceedingly fond of this person, Fourier Lugunica.

If asked who he loved most in this world, with a heart-wrenching resolve he would choose Crusch—but he liked Fourier enough that he would have to shake him off to make that choice. —Since he would never hesitate with anyone else, it was a special case.

That said, such thoughts were disrespectful, so he would never say them aloud.

Because Fourier was royalty of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, the actual child of the current King, Randohal Lugunica, and a most noble personage who bore the title of Fourth Prince.

Be that as it may—

Ferris: “…Your Highness, is it meow-meow this time? Please calm down, purr-lease.”

Fourier: “How could I possibly stay calm! Were you even listening to me?! It's Crusch and my elder brother getting married?! What am I supposed to do?!"

Clinging to Ferris's slender body, Fourier looked up at him with a face on the verge of tears. Being told to keep one's distance with someone like that was difficult. No matter how much Ferris tried to maintain a proper distance, Fourier would crush that distance in an instant.

It was a casual manner of dealing quite unlike that of royalty, but Ferris did not dislike being treated as a friend. On the contrary, to be honest, it made him so happy deep down that he could not say anything.

Even now, he patted the head of the clinging Fourier and soothed him with a gentle "There, there."

Ferris: "Even so, Your Highness's older brother is…"

Fourier: "It is Brother Zabinel! He is the First Prince, so in due time he will become King! Which means, at this rate, Crusch will end up Queen Consort!"

Ferris: "Wow, with Prince Zabinel…"

At the unexpected name, Ferris made his flaxen cat ears tremble and fell into thought.

Even Ferris, for all his connections, had no acquaintance with Zabinel Lugunica, the First Prince. He did at least know that he was about eight years older than Fourier and over twenty.

Ferris: "In high society marriages, an age gap is nothing uncommon, you know. Since Crusch-sama is the daughter of a Ducal Family, it would not be strange at all as a story…"

Fourier: "Then would I not do as well?! I am in the same position, am I not?!"

Ferris: "Well, Ferri-chan would of course love to root for Your Highness's side, too~"

As Fourier shook his shoulders back and forth, Ferris narrowed his yellow eyes. Wilting under that gaze, Fourier asked, “Wh-What is it?”

Fourier: “Why look at me like that? If you have something to say, then say it!”

Ferris: “Then, with all due respect… Your Highness, if you feel that strongly, please hurry and propose directly to Crusch-sama. Ferri-chan would be happier that way.”

Fourier: “Gnuhaa!”

Told to say it, Ferris said it—and Fourier sprang back, his face turning bright red. Blood rushed to his face until it seemed steam might rise, and he took deep breaths over and over.

Fourier: “How could I say it so easily! First of all, I have yet to fulfill my vow! Until that is fulfilled, p-p-p-proposing is…!”

???: “—Your Highness, you were here?”

Fourier: “Hiaaaaa—hk?!”

Startled by the voice from behind, Fourier leaped straight into Ferris’s arms. But Ferris’s slender arms could not support Fourier’s sudden weight.

Ferris: “Kyaa—hk!”

Fourier: “Mm, Ferris!”

Ferris ended up being pushed down by Fourier; his arm was suddenly seized, and his body was pulled in with a yank. Then, just as he should have fallen to the floor, his body was supported; fearfully, Ferris opened his eyes, and—

Crusch: “Are you unharmed, Ferris? That was close.”

Ferris: “C-Crusch-sama…?”

Right before his eyes was the face of his mistress, Crusch Karsten, wearing a relieved smile. Then Ferris realized he was in his mistress's arms, being carried in a princess carry.

Even if it had been on the spur of the moment, Ferris's eyes widened at having put his lady's hands to trouble.

Ferris: "I-I'm so sorry, Crusch-sama! To trouble you like this for Ferri-chan…"

Crusch: "There is no need to apologize. If you are safe, that is best. Besides, you are light."

Ferris: "Crusch-sama… I love you."

Crusch: "And I you."

Still held aloft, Ferris was moved to tears by his mistress's kind words. Swept up in the moment, Ferris confessed his love, and Crusch nodded without a trace of hesitation.

At Crusch's gallant, dashing figure, Ferris's heart pounded—

Fourier: "Wait wait wait wait, this is not right, is it?! While I am sitting on the floor on my butt, do not gaze into each other's eyes and flirt! I am lonely!"

Crusch: "My apologies, Your Highness. …Shall I lift you as well, Your Highness?"

Fourier: "Mm, you are a very stalwart woman! But I am also a boy, so I have a pride that would be hurt! If it were the other way around, perhaps—but being carried is a bit too much!"

Declaring that with gusto, Fourier tearfully got to his feet on his own. Applauding that sight, Ferris was gently lowered from Crusch's arms.

Then, anew, Crusch turned her gaze to Fourier with a "Well then."

Crusch: "So, today you visited Ferris first rather than me. I was surprised to hear Your Highness's voice from downstairs. I have been terribly rude in greeting you so late."

Fourier: “N-No, there is no need to apologize, is there? It is only that I came scurrying in quick steps to Ferris’s place. I simply could not sit still any longer…”

Crusch: “So urgent a matter with Ferris?”

Fourier: “Mm. The truth is, my brother and Crusch are ma—”

Crusch: “Ma?”

Fourier, about to let the main topic slip out casually, cut off his words. But since about half of them had already flown out, there was no avoiding Crusch’s suspicion.

Fourier’s face grew damp with cold sweat. His red eyes wavered, seeking help from Ferris standing at Crusch’s side. However, Ferris could only shake his head.

Before they could discuss any counterplan, Crusch had arrived because Fourier’s voice had been too loud. To be honest, Ferris already thought that they had no choice but to confess.

Let him use the momentum to propose, and the two whom Ferris adored would be joined. For the time being, how about that flow—Ferris looked at Fourier with eyes full of prayer.

Receiving that gaze, Fourier caught his breath. And then—

Fourier: “The truth is, my brother is insisting that he wants to duel Crusch!”

2

Ferris: “Your Highness, why did you say something like that?”

Fourier: “Do not look at me like that! I am reflecting deeply as well! Behold! The cold sweat on my back has not stopped all this time! My throat is getting parched…”

Handed a water jug and a glass, Fourier downed the water with the gusto of a traveler tasting his first drink in days. Watching him out of the corner of his eye, Ferris sighed.

Was switching the topic from marriage to a duel in order to cover it up really such a good idea?

Ferris: “At the very least, it seems Crusch-sama was pleased, but…”

Fourier: “Crusch is gallant and earnest. That is greatly attractive as well, but at this rate will she not end up suddenly challenging my brother to a duel?”

Ferris: “It would be a problem if it came to that, so please handle this properly, Your Highness!”

Fourier: “O-Of course! If anything were to happen to Crusch because of this, my future blueprint would be thrown into great confusion!”

For the moment, it was the turmoil of that “future blueprint” that continued to stir the situation up, but Ferris did not comment on that.

To begin with, the origin of the matter was the talk of marriage between the First Prince and Crusch that Fourier had brought. Honestly, this was the first Ferris had heard of it, so he was more than appropriately surprised. Only, Fourier had been about a hundred times more flustered than Ferris, which had allowed him to calm down a little.

When there is someone more agitated than oneself, one’s heart, strangely, settles.

Ferris: “By the way, regarding the problematic match between Crusch-sama and the First Prince… where did you hear that?”

Fourier: “Y-Yes. In fact, I happened to overhear Father and my elder brother discussing something at the castle. Since my brother has passed twenty years of age, it is about time he needs a match.”

Ferris: “Well, at his age it would be natural for him to have a fiancée and the like. But for that to be Crusch-sama…”

No matter how you looked at it, Ferris found it dubious.

This certainly did not mean that Crusch was unfit to be Queen. To begin with, Fourier's feelings were obvious to everyone except the person in question, Crusch herself, so Ferris could not imagine the King, the First Prince, and Meckart, who was Crusch's father, arranging such an unreasonable match.

Fourier did not have such a rash temperament, but depending on the case it would not be strange if the two of them accidentally eloped abroad. In that case, what would become of Ferris?

Ferris: "If you would let me accompany you, Ferri-chan would be very happy. Ah, but but, if Crusch-sama were to become Queen Consort, would that not be very cool in its own way…?"

Fourier: "Wait wait wait wait, Ferris! Are you my enemy? Are you going to turn against me?"

Ferris: "Ahem. No, that is not the case. It is just that when I picture Crusch-sama sitting beside the throne as Queen, that alone makes my chest feel full…"

Fourier: "I beg you?! You truly are my only lifeline!"

That the Fourth Prince of the kingdom had only one person he could rely on was questionable, but being the one relied upon did not feel bad.

Drawing a short breath, Ferris said,

Ferris: "Understood. Leave this matter to Ferri-chan. I shall risk life and limb and show you I will manage something!"

3

Ferris: "Crusch-sama, do you have a fiancé or anything?"

Crusch: "That's rather sudden. What's this about?"

In the garden, Crusch, who had been swinging a wooden sword, widened her amber eyes at Ferris's question. Turning back and wiping the sweat at her neck, she looked so gallant that Ferris nearly found himself gazing in admiration. However, the image of Fourier’s tearful face rose on the inside of his eyelids, and Ferris steeled his heart.

Putting off admiring Crusch for later, he insisted, Ferris: “It’s an impurrtant matter.”

Ferris: “It’s very late to bring this up, but Ferri-chan intends to serve at Crusch-sama’s side for life. If that’s so, when Crusch-sama marries, I’ll be serving that person as well, right? When I thought about that, I just couldn’t get to sleep at night anymore…”

Crusch: “I see, that makes sense. However, in that case it was a groundless worry.”

Ferris: “What do you mean?”

Shaking his flaxen cat ears, Ferris waited for Crusch to continue. Then, with no particular strain, Crusch said,

Crusch: “I have no fiancé. Strictly speaking, it isn’t quite so clear-cut, though…”

Ferris: “Just when I was about to say “Yay!” and be happy, you go and get vague. That’s unlike Crusch-sama—so what do you mean?”

Crusch: “Right. I suppose I can tell you. — In fact, I used to have one.”

Ferris: ““Had”… a fiancé?! And who was it?”

Wanting to gather as much information as possible, Ferris tried to uncover the truth of Crusch’s hidden fiancé. At his retainer’s forward-leaning stance, Crusch, unusually, hesitated and said,

Crusch: “…The Prince.”

Ferris: “—Pardon?”

Crusch: “Do not make me say it again. Prince Fourier was my fiancé.”

Ferris: “…”

Stroking her own green hair and averting her gaze, Crusch murmured. Hearing that, Ferris, while captivated by Crusch's feminine gesture, was swallowed by a storm of questions in his heart. —That Crusch and Fourier had originally been engaged, huh.

Ferris: "Um, then, why was it dissolved…?"

Crusch: "That was merely following Prince Fourier's instruction. You know that the Prince and I have, from before, a vow regarding the sword."

Ferris: "Uh, that, yes."

When she mentioned the sword vow between Crusch and Fourier, Ferris nodded reluctantly. The promise exchanged between the two had originally been an oath Fourier made her swear so that Crusch, who bore a strong interest in matters like swordsmanship and dragon-riding, would not have femininity forced upon her. Unless Fourier could defeat Crusch with the sword, Crusch would not have any unwanted femininity forced upon her. In other words—

Crusch: "His Highness took my feelings into account and volunteered to play the villain. To answer those feelings, I could only accept his proposal with sincerity."

Ferris: "…So you refused the role of the Prince's fiancée?"

Crusch: "His Highness made that promise to me. I must answer it."

With a bashful smile, Crusch said that, and Ferris was left speechless. In short, it was Fourier's self-destruction. He had brought it upon himself. To go further, the dissolution of the engagement was also Fourier's fault; it was a prime example of tying himself up in his own rope.

Ferris: "Crusch-sama… whatever future awaits us, will you keep Ferri-chan by your side forever?"

Crusch: "Of course. At this point, there is no way I would let you go. And on your side, do not think you can get away from me."

Ferris: "Crusch-sama, Ferri-chan is already head over heels~"

Honestly, just getting those words out of her was enough to satisfy Ferris.

4

Ferris: “So, with that, let us decide on the date for the duel between His Highness Zabinel and Crusch-sama.”

Fourier: “How did it come to that?! What became of that reassuring declaration?!”

Ferris: “I am sorry. Meow-aybe I just could not stand watching Your Highness spin your wheels…”

Having finished his fact-finding with Crusch, Ferris reported the circumstances to Fourier.

That said, he kept from Fourier the fact of the dissolution of the engagement that had existed between Crusch and Fourier. From what he had heard, that matter had apparently not been conveyed to Fourier.

In fact, if Fourier knew as much, a great many things would change. Probably, perhaps, surely even Fourier would—so Ferris wanted to believe.

At any rate, if he were to hear that there had been an engagement with Crusch he himself had not known about, and that it had been dissolved because of his own words and deeds, the Fourier Ferris knew might well faint.

Even Ferris, as expected, felt sympathy that the engagement had been quietly dissolved.

Ferris: “Well, as for the part where you have been a hopeless wimp the whole time, Ferri-chan is angry at Your Highness.”

Fourier: “Even I— even I am making efforts, you know? Only, when I stand before Crusch and at the moment I try to convey the fullness of my feelings, my face flushes, sweat comes out, my words catch, Crusch is so lovely I cannot look at her directly, and it all turns into utter chaos.”

Ferris: “That is… Hearing that makes Your Highness unbearably cute, though.”

Even Fourier, who was always brimming with baseless confidence, could not triumph over the sickness of love. That sweetly pricked at Ferris’s heart, but, taken literally, he could not allow him to lean on that.

Ferris: “At any rate! Since Your Highness spouted whatever came out of your mouth, you must properly take responsibility. Crusch-sama, too, thrilled at crossing swords with the First Prince she has never sparred with, is preparing in very high spirits.”

Fourier: “Hm, I very much want to see that Crusch. I do, but in fact there is good news as well. While you were working hard, it is not as though I was doing nothing, you know?”

Ferris: “Wow, really? Then, that “good news” is…”

Fourier: “Mm. In truth, my elder brother’s marriage partner was not Crusch. It seems he is to become engaged to the granddaughter of Azah Febry of the Council of Wise Men. I was relieved.”

Breaking into a broad smile as if to say “What a relief—” Fourier beamed. However, upon hearing that explanation, Ferris’s face turned sour. At that reaction, Fourier tilted his head with an “Huh?”

Fourier: “I had assumed you would rejoice together with me…”

Ferris: “No, um, I am happy, you know? Very happy. But then, what was it meow, exactly, that Your Highness heard?”

At the point he had heard from Crusch, because the dissolution of the engagement with Fourier had been offered from Crusch’s side, the match with the First Prince had rather gained in reality. For that to be overturned all at once, there had to be a corresponding reason.

At Ferris’s doubt, Fourier scratched his cheek and said, “About that —”

Fourier: “I overheard Father and my elder brother talking and took it for granted they meant Crusch. But apparently, from the very start, that was not the case.”

Ferris: “…What exactly were His Majesty the King and His Highness Zabinel talking about?”

Fourier: “Mm. That for my brother’s marriage partner, they must choose the foremost woman in the kingdom. Which is to say, I ended up certain they meant Crusch!”

Ferris: “Your Highness, hurry up and propose to Crusch-sama—!!”

It goes without saying that Ferris’s furious bellow laid Fourier flat. And that was that.

Epilogue:
Bonds of Ice / What Happened After

Subaru: "—So yeah, that's how Cinderella teamed up with the three little pig brothers, beat the seven dwarves, and successfully brought Princess Kaguya back safe and sound from Onigashima."

Saying that, Subaru finished telling the grand epic that had followed a bafflingly complex course. Then, peeking with his eyes half-open, he gauged Emilia's reaction as she listened.

Emilia, with her violet eyes moist, gently set a hand to her own cheek and said,

Emilia: "…I'm glad. It was a story where everyone could end up happy. Partway through, I was super worried it might turn out to be a sad story."

Subaru: "Well, I could've steered it into a downer, too, but I'm a happy-ending supremacist. Also, I prefer it when there aren't any dyed-in-the-wool villains. Which is why the seven dwarves had their own motives."

Emilia: "Yeah. I never realized the seven dwarves were trying to protect Onigashima for Princess Kaguya's sake…"

Listening to Subaru's thoughts on storytelling, Emilia exhaled in relief as she stroked her ample chest and grew pensive. In the middle of that, she glanced at Subaru and said, "Ah, but,"

Emilia: "If I remember right, I asked you to tell me your story, and then partway through it turned into something completely different…"

Subaru: "I mean, I thought about going the route of embellishing and adding more meat to it, but I figured the hook wouldn't be good. How to put it… no matter what you mix into black paint, it still ends up black…"

Emilia: “Uh, uh, did I ask something weird…?”

As Subaru shook his head—no, no—Emilia felt a little relieved.

She had been the one to beg him, but Subaru was the one who’d veered off topic. She had kind of thought maybe there was something Subaru didn’t want to talk about, so he told a story like the one just now instead.

Puck: “But it was a blood-stirring, flesh-leaping kind of spectacular blockbuster, you know. Subaru, maybe you’re cut out for a job like storyteller?”

Emilia: “Ah, I think so too. Subaru’s suuuper good at talking.”

Subaru: “Storyteller… bard—then I’d overlap job-wise with Liliana. Still, compared to being a gadabout who can’t meet the conditions to change class to Sage, it might have more of a future.”

Emilia: “Sorry, I don’t really get what you’re saying.”

Hand at his chin, Subaru sank into serious thought, and Emilia cocked her head. Sometimes, the things Subaru blurts out are incomprehensible.

Each time, Emilia reflects that she hasn’t studied enough, but according to Pack and Ram, that apparently isn’t because of any lack of study. Complicated.

And then, with Emilia furrowing her shapely brows like that—

Subaru: “Whoops, not good. Look at the time already. A traveling merchant’s supposed to come today.”

Emilia: “A traveling merchant… they’re coming all the way to the manor?”

Subaru: “They said they’re coming by dragon carriage from a ways off. Well, the snow’s melted a lot, so at least the roads aren’t all slushy—count your blessings.”

At Subaru’s words, Emilia nodded in agreement. Given yesterday’s conditions, the roads had still been a bit snowy, so coming by dragon carriage would have been quite a chore.

Thinking about it that way, it was sad that the snow and the snow statues were melting, but it had been necessary.

Subaru: “To-To-To—speak of the devil.”

Suddenly, the bell announcing the visitor’s arrival rang out, and with a mop in one hand Subaru headed for the door. Then he stopped, turned just his head back toward Emilia, and said,

Subaru: “Emilia-tan, what’ll you do? Wanna go say hi?”

Emilia: “Me? I… hmm, maybe I’ll pass. I’m not ready for greetings and all.”

Subaru: “Yeah? With you, Emilia-tan, you’re totally cute even in that loungewear, so it wouldn’t be a problem… no, it would be a problem. Too cute. A family heirloom blade should be kept sheathed until its moment.”

Nodding to himself like that, Subaru waved to Emilia and headed for the entrance hall. Seeing his back off, Emilia felt a little grateful for Subaru’s thoughtfulness.

Probably, he’d been considerate of Emilia’s feelings—how hard it was to bring up.

Puck: “Isn’t that giving Subaru a bit too much credit?”

Emilia: “That’s not true. Subaru’s a good boy. I…”

Puck: “Lia’s a good girl too, you know? She’s my pride and joy of a daughter.”

Emilia: “Yes yes, thanks.”

Floating softly, Puck perched on her shoulder, and Emilia responded perfunctorily. Hearing that, Puck covered his face with both hands in mock lament, but Emilia didn’t engage.

Then, after pondering just a little, she quietly started toward the direction Subaru had gone.

Puck: “Huh? Changed your mind after all?”

Emilia: “No, not exactly. If I go out there… I might end up startling the traveling merchant, right? I’m just going to take a teeny, tiny peek.”

Lately, those who had come to the Roswaal Manor were bards, chefs with first-rate skills, or that mage who really wanted to give Roswaal a piece of their mind, so Emilia herself was very interested.

Of course, she wouldn’t be let down even if it was just an ordinary, unremarkable traveling merchant—but—

Emilia: “Sneak, sneak…”

Given what she’d just said to Subaru, it would be awkward if she were found, so she moved her feet quietly. Reaching a spot from which she could look down over the entrance hall, Emilia peered gently beneath her.

In the hall, the visiting merchant was already spreading out the goods he’d brought. Subaru and Rem were both together, studying them intently.

The traveling merchant seemed to be a young couple. While the husband unloaded the luggage from the dragon carriage, the woman—presumably the wife—was explaining the products to Subaru and Rem—

Emilia: “—ah.”

In that instant, Emilia’s violet eyes flew wide, and a sound slipped from her lips before she knew it.

Seeing Emilia’s reaction, Puck called to her, Puck: “Lia?” But Emilia couldn’t answer that voice. She couldn’t take her eyes off her. —Not the merchandise, but the woman.

Among the couple who had come as traveling merchants, the young wife's face struck a chord of déjà vu.

—Suddenly, an old, subzero memory flashed across Emilia's mind.

It was back when Emilia had only just woken up in her homeland's forest, when she still knew nothing about her looks, about her power, about anything at all; a family being attacked by a witchbeast.

And there, after seven years had passed since then, was the girl, now all grown up.

Subaru: "Even so, doing the traveling merchant thing as a married couple sounds tough, huh."

While Emilia stood frozen in shock, downstairs Subaru and the others' conversation picked up steam. Even now, Subaru smiled at the merchant couple and had just broached that topic. In response,

Merchant's Wife: "That's true."

With a faint smile, she continued,

Merchant's Wife: "But I love traveling… it's also for this person's dream. My father and mother encouraged me, too, and I intend to follow him for life."

Subaru: "…Heh, red-hot. That's ridiculously lovely."

Merchant's Wife: "Yes."

Answering bashfully, the wife drew Subaru's gaze of yearning. At his words, her smile deepened and a faint blush on her cheeks made her look all the more endearing.

Seeing that, and then hearing what was just said, Emilia drew in a sharp breath. Then she turned on her heel and left the entrance hall quickly; only after she had put sufficient distance between herself and it did she let that breath out.

Puck: "Lia? What's wrong all of a sudden? Are you really okay?"

Emilia: "…Hey, Puck. That girl just now said her father and mother encouraged her to be a traveling merchant, right? That must be something recent, don't you think?"

Puck: "Huh? Mm, well, I guess so? They looked like a young couple; I think they probably married recently, too. …Why? What about it?"

At Puck's puzzled head tilt, Emilia squeezed her eyes shut. Then she slowly lifted her hand and, with it, struck her own face hard.

Smack smack.

With a dry sound, a tingling sensation ran through her, and Emilia's eyes opened.

And—

Emilia: "—I'm glad. That girl, and her family, they're doing well."

Puck: "…I don't really get it, but that's something that makes you happy, right, Lia? If so, then I'm happy that you're happy. Good for you."

Emilia: "Yeah, I feel suuuper relieved. It's something I'd been wondering about all this time."

Because she hadn't told even Puck about it, this truly had been Emilia's secret alone.

Back in her homeland. In a time when she still knew nothing, there had been a family she had frightened; she hadn't been able to confirm what became of the parents and their little daughter.

Now that she had unexpectedly learned it, Emilia felt her heart grow clear.

Emilia: "Hehe, somehow, right now I feel like I could just float up and fly through the sky."

Puck: "Then we're matching, huh. Napping above the clouds feels great, you know."

Emilia: “Wow, really?”

Laughing like that, Emilia and Puck strolled leisurely down the manor’s corridor.

There was a spring to their steps. It wasn’t as though a weight that had been on her heart for years had been lifted—but still, it felt just a little lighter.

—Because she could feel such a gentle feeling, it seemed like she could hold hope for the future that lay ahead.

END

Another Memory Snow

Chapter 1:
The Oni Sisters’ Memory Snow

1

“—That is all, Sister. I have finished changing your clothes.”

Saying this, the blue-haired girl—Rem tapped her sister’s shoulders from behind as she sat before the dresser and then inclined her body to bring her face next to her sister’s.

The pink-haired elder sister—Ram, bore an extreme resemblance to her save for their hair and eye colors. However, Ram was much more wonderful, her beautiful countenance was dignified and unshakeable.

Rem was always telling herself that she too had to follow Ram’s example as she admired her elder sister’s elegance.

However, even Ram’s dignified elegance was shaken this morning—

“…Thank you, Rem. But even this amount of clothes will not suffice, not nearly.”

“Sister…”

Ram’s voice trembled as she muttered this, the reason being the temperature which was so cold the room’s windows were turning white as they froze.

The Roswaal Manor was suffering an out of season cold wave at the moment, and there was even a little snow falling outside the frozen windows. The exterior of the mansion was turning white as snow enveloped it, one look at this would be enough to understand the extent of the cold this abnormal weather produced.

On especially cold mornings such as this one, merely getting Ram out of bed was quite the struggle in itself. With Rem’s desperate persuasion and cooperation from Ram who loved her little sister, they were at long last able to finish changing her clothes.

Perhaps one might think of it as exaggerated, but Ram’s condition as she shivered from the cold was truly pitiful to look at.

Even Rem who wasn’t particularly bad at dealing with the cold was unable to stay in her usual maid outfit which exposed her back and shoulders, instead opting for a thicker maid outfit which was intended for colder seasons—The ice season. And Ram, who was even weaker against the cold than Rem, had gone beyond that as she donned earmuffs and covered herself with a blanket in order to endure the cold.

“Are you alright, sister? It wounds Rem’s heart to watch you suffer like this.”

“Yes, I suppose it would. With only this much warmth, it would be impossible for Ram to work like she usually does. Rem, please embrace me from behind. I would like to receive some warmth.”

“Yes! If you’re okay with Rem!”

Obeying Ram’s request, Rem firmly embraced her elder sister from behind. Stretching her arms to the limit, it was as if she was trying to completely wrap up Ram’s body.

Ram rested her head against Rem’s chest as she heaved a long, deep sigh in her younger sister’s embrace.

“Haa, I can feel your love, Rem… Perhaps we should just stay like this until the sunshine starts pouring in.”

“Umm, Rem is glad to be of use to you, sister, but judging by these weather conditions I am unsure if there will be any sunshine at all today.”

“Well then, I suppose we have an excuse to cling to each other all day long.”

“Fufu, we cannot do that, sister. No matter how cold it gets, we are still the maids of this mansion.”

Smiling at Ram's somewhat spoiled words, Rem nuzzled her cheek against her sister's head which was in her chest. Ram sighed again as the sensation ruffled her pink hair.

"I have heard that sighing means you're letting your happiness escape. Subaru taught me this."

"Is that right? But unlike Barusu who is freezing to death alone, Ram is currently wrapped up in your kindness and warmth. Thinking of the difference in our level of happiness brings about a sense of superiority, doesn't it."

There was no problem at all even if she lost a bit of happiness by sighing, Rem couldn't help but admire her sister as she boldly declared this.

Regardless, considering the situation, the idea of Subaru freezing to death wasn't one she could laugh off even as a joke.

"It seems Subaru has been feeling quite cold as well these past few days…"

"Calling him weak would not even begin to describe him, after all. His ability as a servant is completely lacking, and he is utterly unable to adapt to his surroundings. I do wonder what exactly his strong point is supposed to be."

"You and Subaru, the two of you are the source of Rem's strength."

"I would have been happy about that if I weren't placed on the same level as Barusu."

With her lips relaxing, Ram donned a faint, wry smile as she cast her eyes in the window's direction. The freezing window was covered in white fog, and the mansion's front yard on the other side was barely even visible, but—

"—Does Lady Emilia intend to feign ignorance even with this much snowfall?"

"Umm…"

"Master Roswaal is overlooking it, so Ram, noble as she is, has elected to remain silent as well, however this situation is definitely one brought about by Lady Emilia… Or rather, the Great Spirit, is it not?"

"…Lady Emilia isn't particularly suited to deception, after all."

When she heard Ram's deduction, Rem forced a smile as she murmured this.

The extreme chill that had been assailing the Roswaal Manor for the past few days—The reality of the situation was that almost everyone in the mansion had seen through it, and knew what exactly was causing it.

The Great Spirit who accompanied Emilia, bearing the form of a cat, had entered his magical release period.

"I suppose his degree of freedom within this mansion is not quite what it was back in the forest. To think that he would cause this cold because of that… Ram feels she has gotten caught up in quite the troublesome situation."

"That's true, isn't it. But it is definitely possible to learn from one's mistakes. Even Rem was completely hopeless when she first came to the mansion, and would always trouble sister and Miss Frederica."

As she thought back to how incompetent she was in the past, Rem looked like she was going to turn red to her ears.

She definitely didn't think she was flawless even now, but she was even worse back then. Considering this, she thought it was only natural that a spirit arts user and her Great Spirit would mess up like this because of the sudden change in their surroundings.

"Furthermore, thanks to this cold, I can see Subaru all wrapped up in fluffy clothes, it is very cute."

"Mm, I can't overlook what you just said. If it's about being wrapped up in fluffy clothes, surely Ram is more than a match for him. And if it's about cuteness, it is definitely an overwhelming victory for me."

"My sister is wonderful. But Subaru is important to me as well."

"How stubborn."

Ram's response was short, but her expression was gentle and her voice was warm. This caused Rem to display a faint smile as well, after which she curtsied where she stood.

"At this rate, Lady Emilia and the Great Spirit should be done with their little secret in a few more days. I am happy to be able to see you in your ice season clothing in the meantime, sister."

"It seems you've developed a talent for sweet talking. Very well, I'll play along."

"Thank you very much, sister. Well then, it is about time we started working. Rem has to go see Subaru too."

"There's no helping it. Thanks to you, I feel like I can move my body a bit. But I must request that you embrace me once every hour."

"Yes, understood. Alright then, I shall see you later."

With a last look at Ram who was bundling herself in her blanket from the cold, Rem headed towards Subaru's room.

"…I ended up saying that to sister, but."

She felt apologetic toward her shivering sister, in truth not even Rem knew how long Emilia and Puck would take to deal with this. She certainly pitied Subaru and her sister for having to deal with this cold, but she was also happy that she was able to see them wear things that they wouldn't normally choose. Rem's feelings were complicated.

"The sole point of anxiety was that the snow might end up crushing the plants and flower beds, but Miss Beatrice somehow managed to do something about that."

As she said this, she took a look out of the corridor's window, at the white snow that was falling in silence. The only thing Rem was worried about was the effect this would have on the plans and flower beds she dutifully trimmed every day, but thankfully they were secretly protected from harm by Beatrice's valiant efforts,

It seemed as though Beatrice was helping Emilia and Puck from the shadows, it looked like she had erected a barrier that would prevent the cold from overflowing into the outside of the mansion.

In summary, the responses of each of the mansion's inhabitants to this cold were as follows: Roswaal was simply waiting and watching, and Ram complied with her master's intentions. Beatrice was supporting them in secret, and Subaru was just being toyed with.

"Subaru, how cute…"

Now that it was this cold, Subaru would suddenly have his snot frozen before he even realized it so Rem definitely had to do something for him. Thanks to this cold, she had a justification to never take her eyes off him.

"But it might be troublesome to my sister if I said this, so I won't."

But even Ram had gone as far to say that she wanted to be embraced once every hour which was awfully cute of her. Rem was already satisfied with that much.

Even if this cold were to persist for a few more days, she wouldn't mind in the slightest, that was how she felt.

—With a spring in her step, Rem was the one enjoying the mansion's chilly weather the most.

2

But unfortunately for her, that modest, wicked wish of hers would not last long.

Because when Subaru realized that his windows were frozen, his snot was turning into icicles, and his neck was producing creaking sounds when he turned it, he set about searching for the culprit with vigor and soon exposed Emilia and Puck's involvement.

And then the fact that this was happening because of Puck's magical release period, the fact that Beatrice was supporting them in secret, and the fact that Emilia really did seem to be trying to keep this a secret.

Having discovered each person's involvement, everyone gathered together to think of a solution to this problem. But as expected, the one who spoke up was Subaru.

"This is the grand opening of the first Chikichiki—The Roswaal Manor sponsored snow festival!"

As Subaru loudly declared this, Rem secretly burned his profile into her heart.

"Sister, all of the villagers from Earlham have gathered in the front yard. The Chikichiki snow festival shall soon begin."

"…'Chikichiki', please stop using that nonsensical term."

Ram, who was wrapped up in her blanket, warned Rem who had come to wake her up.

The time seemed to fly right by, and it was now the morning of the snow festival Subaru had proposed.

The cold weather Puck had brought about caused snow to cover the mansion grounds, the snowfall was especially heavy in the courtyard, and produced a genuine snowscape the likes of which one wouldn't often see even in the Ice season.

Within this snowscape, there were a number of faces one wouldn't usually see around the mansion. They were villagers who inhabited Earlham, having been invited to the snow festival, they were showing their readiness to participate in the snow sculpture making.

Since almost everyone from the village had shown up, the mansion was extremely lively.

"This is yet another one of Subaru's personal virtues, after all."

"They're probably just aiming for the prize… But there's likely no small number of villagers who are just like Barusu in that they just want to have fun with this festival."

In response to Rem's strangely prideful words, Ram who was stirring in her bed spoke with dissatisfaction. As she listened to her sister talk, Rem threw open the room's curtains.

She definitely couldn't say the skies were clear, but there was a world of difference from the gloomy weather they had these past few days. Rem had heard Subaru and Puck discuss this, that Puck would create all the snow they needed in the night, and keep the temperature at a level where it wouldn't melt for one day.

"But to freely manipulate the weather to this extent… The Great Spirit really was a Great Spirit after all."

"I understand what you're trying to say, but that irreverent way of putting it is quite cute, Rem."

"I apologize. It's just, he is always frolicking with Lady Emilia, frolicking in Lady Emilia, playing with Subaru, basking in the sun… That was how he appeared to be."

To be honest, Rem's impression of Puck wasn't much more than that of a talking cat.

Now that she had actually seen his power, she could finally understand his true nature.

"—That Great Spirit, could not possibly be such an easygoing being."

"Sister?"

"I was just saying that it would be ideal if he really was satisfied just sunbathing and eating small fish like a real cat. Anyway, what do you wish to do, Rem?"

Rem tilted her head, unable to hear her sister's low voice, and Ram asked her this in response. Having been asked what she wanted to do, Rem pondered for a bit.

As one of the mansion's maids, Rem figured she probably had to help out with the snow festival. However, Subaru who was full of vigor told them to leave the festival in his hands, his breath wild.

Thanks to him, Rem did not have much to do today beyond her usual chores. Even Ram could probably go back to sleep like she always wanted to.

However—

"—Rem, please tell me what you're thinking. Who exactly do you think I am?"

"Ah…"

"Has Ram ever bluntly rejected her cute little sister's wishes I wonder?"

Dressed in her night clothes and with a blanket draped over her head, Ram looked all the more dignified and her smile pierced Rem's heart. Rem then looked downward and clenched her fist tightly,

"Sister, Rem would like to participate in the snow festival with you. Because it would be our first time together in such a snowscape."

"I see, there's no helping it then. Now matter how terrible the cold may be, I shall do it for your sake."

When Rem built up her resolve and said these somewhat spoiled words, Ram immediately took her blanket off and stepped off her bed onto the floor. Rem's eyes widened when she saw this, "Is it really okay?"

"Even though you struggle with the cold."

"If it's for your sake, Ram can easily overcome a struggle or two. In exchange, please help Ram change out of these clothes. Because of the cold, merely standing up pushed me to my limit."

"Y-Yes! Right away, sister!"

Ram’s face was noticeably paler than usual as she extended her arms, and Rem rushed to the closet in a hurry. Ram’s lips relaxed as she watched her flustered little sister from behind.

“The snow isn’t bad either, huh… I can’t accept this cold, though.”

She whispered as she saw her little sister in high spirits befitting her age.

3

“Just where exactly did we go wrong? Why was our score so low…”

“As you can see, it was clearly due to the Barusu parts. As expected, we should have devoted our efforts to reproducing Master Roswaal’s likeness.”

Standing next to each other, the sisters gazed upon their collaborative project, ‘The Magnificent Master Subawaal Sculpture’.

The snow festival ended on a high note, and the snow sculptures the villagers had left behind were scattered all around the mansion’s courtyard. In the end, a girl from the village had been chosen as the winner, and she went home delighted after Subaru personally handed her her prize.

Even the other villagers were already satisfied with having participated in the snow festival, so they did not raise a fuss over this decision and it could be said that the event came to a close peacefully.

Surely, the fact that Rem and Ram could leisurely take their time evaluating their work like this was also thanks to this.

“Unbelievable, twelve points in total…”

“Hardly any difference from Lady Emilia and Miss Beatrice…”

Heaving white sighs, the sisters dropped their shoulders in unison.

An outside observer might consider their words and crestfallen attitudes disrespectful, but fortunately, these two were the only people around and there was no worry of anyone overhearing their remarks.

Incidentally, Emilia and Beatrice had received nine and seven points respectively.

Regardless, their sculpture created through great effort, ‘The Magnificent Master Subawaal Sculpture’—Which Ram and Rem, upon entering the snow festival, combined their wisdom and strength to create ultimately ended up receiving mixed reviews.

The craftsmanship itself certainly wasn’t inferior to any of the other favorite candidates. But for some reason, all three judges had unfavorable impressions of it and they ended up with a subpar score. But among the three, since they knew what scores Subaru and Roswaal had given them, it could only mean that the anonymous judge had given them the lowest score of all which was rather annoying.

“This anonymous judge, just who exactly… It’d probably be wise not to investigate.”

“I suppose so. More importantly, let us look for points we can improve so we can prepare for the next snow festival. How about making it more like Master Roswaal like you suggested, sister?”

“I do not wish to force concessions out of you, but I am certainly interested. Give it a try.”

“Yes. Here, like this, and this…”

They were particular about the height as well, so she used a raised platform in order to make some subtle adjustments, starting from the facial region. Since the base of the statue was already complete, Rem’s dexterous hands reshaped it in the blink of an eye.

Her heart was pained as she scraped off the Subaru parts she had recommended so highly, and made the Roswaal parts Ram had wanted more prominent. And thus, ‘The Magnificent Master Roswaal Sculpture’ was formed.

“It is complete, sister! What do you think? I believe it looks rather good.”

“…Yes, I suppose so. Just as I’d expect, Rem. You’ve done well.”

Hopping off her raised platform, she stood next to Ram and admired the snow sculpture.

She was tooting her own horn, but Rem felt that she had successfully reproduced Roswaal’s image which she had been familiar with since childhood. She thought for sure Ram would be delighted as well, but—

“Sister, does it not suit your taste?”

“That is no fault of yours, Rem. It is little more than a sentimental problem.”

“Sentimental…”

“I was just thinking. Even with such a well-made sculpture, what Ram wants is the real thing after all.”

“…”

Ram crossed her arms and spoke, and Rem fell silent as she felt the intense emotions those words contained. She then once again looked at the snow sculpture, and understood Ram’s feelings towards what was ultimately a fake Roswaal.

Rem agreed completely with her sister’s words. A fake was a fake after all. It was no match for the real thing.

“Well, this is unfortunate, but shall we go ahead and destroy it?”

“…I don’t think it’s necessary to go that far, though.”

“Y-You think so?” Since it’s not the real thing, I thought we might as well…”

“You have these moments now and then, huh. It’s very cute.”

Rem was embarrassed, having jumped to an erroneous conclusion, and Ram gently patted her head. As she felt Ram's kindness, Rem abandoned the idea of making a Subaru snow sculpture in secret.

"By the way, you said something rather interesting. Something about the next snow festival."

"Ah, that's…"

"Do you believe there will be another snow festival, Rem?"

At point blank range, so close they could feel each other's breaths, Ram asked her this.

To Ram who was weak against the cold, the circumstances surrounding a snow festival were probably terribly unpleasant. But at least she enjoyed the snow festival itself, Rem allowed herself to think this.

Her proof was the fact that Ram was smiling more than usual.

"Even the people of Earlham liked the snow festival itself, and we were unprepared this time, but with advance notice, it would be easier to put on an exciting event. Furthermore…"

"Furthermore?"

"Should these peaceful times continue, the Great Spirit's magical release period shall arrive again sooner or later. When that happens, I think this sort of snow festival would be the best way to deal with it."

"…"

With a sour expression, Ram fell silent at Rem's words.

The anguish in Ram's heart was clearly visible. However, reality was rather harsh on Ram.

Regardless, Puck would need an opportunity to release his pent up mana and a snow festival would prove useful for this, surely even Ram had to admit that much.

Furthermore, supposing their next opportunity were to appear like this—

“It would be proof that the times are so peaceful that the Great Spirit does not even have an opportunity to use his mana, isn’t that right.”

“That was what Rem was thinking. Um, sister…”

Rem timidly looked up at her sister to ascertain her reaction. On the receiving end of her gaze, Ram closed her eyes for a moment, and then let out a small sigh.

“At the very least, Lady Emilia will be staying with us for the next three years due to the royal selection. It would be difficult to say nothing of the sort will happen again in that time.”

“…”

“So I don’t think it’s a bad thing to be prepared for when that time comes.”

“Sister…”

Rem’s eyes sparkled as she heard Ram’s kind summation, she then leaped into her sister’s chest and embraced her. Rem’s joy caused Ram’s lips to relax as she nuzzled her cheek against her sister’s blue hair.

“Seriously, stop it with that childlike joy.”

“I apologize. But I’m so happy. Getting to play with my sister like this… Even back in the village, it didn’t happen very often.”

When they were children, the sisters spent almost all of their time together. However, spending their time together did not mean they played around particularly frequently.

This was in part because Ram received special treatment as the hope of the demon clan, but simply put, it was also because Rem’s lack of talent rendered her incapable of keeping up with Ram.

Freedom from such roles and the collapse of the invisible wall between them—Both of these were due to the burning of their village and the loss of Ram's horn, so she definitely couldn't just be happy about them.

"How foolish."

"…"

Perceiving the slight sense of guilt that had manifested within Rem, Ram pulled her little sister into her chest. Rem yelped in surprise as Ram caressed her back and then looked up at her elder sister.

With her face right in front of her, Ram formed a smile full of affection that she would only show to Rem.

"Ram is your elder sister. So whatever you want to say and whatever you want to do, tell me. After all, weren't you able to do that just this morning?"

"…Umm, uh."

"Rem."

Rem was unable to get her words out, so Ram gently called to her to help her relax.

This sound brought Rem an immense sense of relief,

"I would like to do this again, I want to enjoy another snow festival with you, sister."

"—. What a hopeless kid. Since this is a request from my little sister, I'll do it just for you."

Ram said this in an exhausted tone, as if sighing, as she ever so gently stroked Rem's head.

Rem quietly closed her eyes as she felt this ticklish sensation against her head and Ram's heartbeat against her cheek.

These troublesome cold days were borne of an unexpected, sudden magical release period, but even so—

“—Rem feels so nice and warm thanks to you and Subaru.”

“I would have been happy about that if I weren’t placed on the same level as Barusu.”

—And so, in that white courtyard filled with snow sculptures, the demon sisters shared this memory of a snowy day.

Chapter 2:
Crusch Camp

1

“Lady Crusch! Lady Crusch!”

In the capital of the Kingdom of Lugunica, a loud voice resounded through the Karsten family’s secondary residence.

With their short skirt and flaxen cat ears fluttering, a lovely character dressed in a blue toned outfit dashed through the corridor with light steps.

Out of breath by the time they reached the room they were looking for, this person flung the door open and barged in.

“Lady Crusch!”

“—You’re being rather boisterous, Ferris. Is something the matter?”

Greeting the cat-eared intruder was the calm voice and countenance of a beautiful woman.

This voice came from the imposing woman sitting at the desk in the room, using her quill to attend to her duties. The woman’s voice contained a tiny trace of affection only known to those close to her.

And receiving this affection directly, the other person smiled gently.

“Yes, Lady Crusch! It’s incredible, it’s shocking, it’s astonishing, I tell you!”

“The fact that you’re emphasizing it to that extent with such a lively voice, I must say I’m expecting something quite significant indeed. So, what kind of tale shall you amuse me with?”

“Myumyuu, please don’t put that sort of weird pressure on me, Lady Crusch. Ah, but Ferri’s got something so surprising it’ll blow those expectations away.”

Saying this, the cat-eared person passed by the desk and went to the window on the other side of the room. They then pulled the thick curtains covering it to the side—

“Please have a look outside the window, Lady Crusch.”

“This is, snow… huh.”

White crystals of lightly falling snow danced down outside the window. The woman—Crusch Karsten narrowed her amber eyes at the sight of the snow descending from the somewhat cloudy sky.

“Quite unusual around this season, is it not. Is this snow not natural?”

“Yes. I think there might be someone using a huge amount of magic or something. It seems the aftereffects of that magic have spread all the way out here.”

“I see. A being capable of manipulating the atmosphere to this extent would certainly be quite the threat, but…”

Rising from her desk, Crusch approached the window which had its curtains opened. Releasing the window’s latch, she gently pushed it open, after which a bit of snow and wind blew into the room.

Gazing at the wind and snow, Crush suddenly smiled,

“Their intent does not appear to be malicious. Furthermore, this degree of snowfall is not severe enough to prove inconvenient. That being the case…”

“That being the case…?”

“…I will be able to enjoy this rare sight with you with no worries.”

Saying this, Crusch turned around and gently took the slender hand that was by her side. Their eyes widening at Crusch’s smooth movement and gesture, the cat-eared person—Ferris’ cheeks reddened,

“Jeez, your splendor is driving Ferri crazy, Lady Crusch…”

And he muttered this with a resigned expression.

2

When he entered the courtyard with Crusch who had donned an overcoat, he found that there was already someone there.

Looking up into the skies, gazing at the snow falling from the faint clouds was an old man whose entire being was clad in heroic spirit, the sight of whom caused Ferris' eyes to widen, "Huh"

"Old Man Wil, why are mew out in the courtyard?"

"Mm, it's you, Ferris… And also, Lady Crusch."

Reacting to his call, the old man—Wilhelm turned around and bowed to them as they approached. In response, Crusch who had linked her arm with Ferris' nodded solemnly.

"It would seem the two of you have come to see the snow as well."

"That is correct. From the way you put it, it would appear that you too have come here for the same purpose."

"Yes. In this kingdom, it is very unusual to see snow in this season. The skies do not seem to have undergone any significant change so I would not say it is anything to worry about, but it also wouldn't do to act after something has already happened."

"Nyaow, don't go saying such boorish things. I had such a great mood going too, coming out here with Lady Crusch so we could watch the snow, just the two of us."

Ferris pouted as he complained about Wilhelm's response. Ferris' dissatisfied gaze caused Wilhelm to force a smile as he offered a slight bow, "My apologies."

"If that is all, let us leave it at that. I do not wish to be a bother to the two of you, thus I shall return to my quarters and await further instructions…"

"Wait, Wilhelm. Your words did not contain any lies, but… I can see that you haven't told us everything."

"…"

"Let me warn you, it would be useless to feign ignorance. I possess the divine protection of wind reading. According to this divine protection, there's definitely a certain something behind that attitude of yours."

As Wilhelm moved to excuse himself, Crusch detained him and pointed to her eyes.

—The divine protection of wind reading was a special ability Crusch possessed, one that truly deserved to be called a heavenly blessing. By reading the natural flow of wind, the user could even comprehend others' emotional states, a divine protection granted only to a special few.

Simply put, lies would not work on Crusch.

Wilhelm's expression changed to one of hesitation when Crusch called him out with her powers of observation. Seeing this unusual reaction, Ferris mischievously narrowed his yellow eyes.

"Hmmm? Gosh, Wil, trying to keep secrets from Crusch? Don't you think it's shameful to have that sort of attitude towards your master to whom you offered your sword and pledged your loyalty?"

"Mm, that is…"

"Or are you perhaps scheming something you can't tell us about? Oh no, Lady Crusch, Ferri's scared… Uyan."

"Good grief. Do not tease Wilhelm so much. I understand your true intentions, but it would be asinine to create unnecessary misunderstandings with that sort of behavior."

Crusch poked Ferris' cheek, surprising him, and then offered him a faint smile. And with Ferris still grasping her arm, she turned to Wilhelm and gave a brief apology, "Excuse us."

"It can be difficult to understand, but Ferris does not bear you any ill will. I hope you have not taken offense at his words.”

“Aah, not at all. I believe his grievance was only natural. You need not be concerned, I do not believe I would misunderstand his true intent either way.”

“I see, that is good then. Now then, what of your ulterior motive?”

“…I am simply no match for you, Lady Crusch.”

Saying this, Wilhelm shook his head with a slight smile. The old man then narrowed his blue eyes and looked up at the snow falling overhead.

“Under the guise of caution towards an unusual event, I was indulging in reverie. The sight of snow brings to mind a conversation I once had with my wife.”

“…Seems to me like just about everything reminds you of your wife, old man. There’s nothing new about that.”

“It is rather embarrassing that I have no response to that.”

With his eyes still on the snow, Wilhelm simply accepted Ferris’s statement without attempting to deny it.

Flashing through those blue eyes of his were deep love for his dead wife—Theresia Van Astrea, and nostalgia for those bygone days.

—His feelings towards his dead wife were a major factor in Wilhelm’s decision to become the royal selection candidate Crusch’s vassal.

Fourteen years ago, the kingdom carried out the ‘Great Conquest’ in order to subjugate one of the Three Great Witchbeasts, the White Whale. Back then, Wilhelm’s wife, Theresia, was one of the people recruited for this mission, and she ultimately died a heroic death in battle when the kingdom’s forces were defeated.

Ever since that day, Wilhelm had continued to chase after the White Whale in order to avenge his wife. Crusch had promised to help him fulfill this most cherished desire of his, and thus made the ‘Sword

Demon' her vassal.

Understanding how dangerous the path would be, Crusch chose to answer this old man's wish.

"But it kind of sucks to always hear your love stories about your wife whenever something happens."

"My apologies. My life only truly began when I met my wife. No matter where I look or what I feel, memories of my wife well up on their own."

Ferris puffed his cheeks, and in response to his dissatisfaction, Wilhelm lowered his eyes and stared at the cat-eared knight head-on as he continued, "That is,"

"Something you understand yourself, surely?"

"—Wil, you coward."

Having a precious feeling in his slender chest touched upon, Ferris spoke resentfully.

Wilhelm had declared that his life only began the moment he met his wife. And that Ferris himself should be able to understand that feeling well.

Ferris'—Felix Argyle's life began when he met Crusch Karsten. Imprisoned by his real parents, Ferris meaninglessly lived on in a half-dead state until she brought him to the outside.

Was it not natural to vow to offer such a person everything they wanted?

"Get a hold of yourselves, you two. We do not know how long this snow will last. Enjoy it while you can."

"Yeees, Lady Crusch. Ferri's just gonna toss this Wil stuff out and forget all about it!"

Crusch stopped her servants' trivial quarrel, and when she did so Ferris raised his hand and hurled some more abuses. Wilhelm smiled bitterly at this, and Crusch continued, “Well then,”

“Might I ask what sort of memory with your wife you were looking back on as you gazed at the snow?”

“Yes, of course. I find it rather delightful that you would wish to learn about my wife.”

As Wilhelm smiled broadly, Crusch faced him with a gallant expression. As he watched this from the side, Ferris couldn’t suppress the bit of envy that welled up within him.

It might have looked as though Crusch was simply saying this sort of thing to show her consideration and magnanimity towards her servants, but that was not the case, she proposed this because she was genuinely very interested. It was not because she had an interest in others’ love affairs as was commonly said, the reason was a lot simpler.

It was because Crusch was a swordswoman who admired the Sword Demon Wilhelm Van Astrea.

Setting Crusch’s true feelings aside, Wilhelm whom she had asked to tell her about his memories nodded a few times and then quietly turned toward the end of the courtyard.

In his line of sight were some shrubbery being covered in bits of snow, and a small flower garden.

“My wife was a woman who liked to admire flowers. Regardless of what kind of flower it was, she would say they each had their own good points so she did not choose any one type to admire. But even so, she did have some flowers that she was particularly attached to. For instance, the yellow flower Diana which can spread its roots in any environment.”

“You occasionally see them in the capital too. What was it that she liked about them?”

“My wife once planted the seeds of this flower in an area of the capital that was still under construction, and it was there that we first met.”

"I shouldn't have asked…"

Ferris had intended to collect himself, but pouted when he ended up poking at the core of Wilhelm's love story.

"I have a number of other stories relating to flowers, but there is one among them connected to snow. Back then, my wife would say that there was a special flower that would only bloom on snowy days."

"A flower that only blooms on snowy days, is it."

Wilhelm's words caused Crusch to quietly look at Ferris. In response to her questioning amber eyes, Ferris thought for a bit but ultimately shook his head.

Unfortunately, Ferris did not know of any flower fitting that description. However, supposing that such a flower really existed,

"That is definitely something I would like to see at least once."

"My wife would often say that whenever there was snowfall. Back then, I was a terribly simple man and the blood flow to my head was lacking. I cannot say that I have improved in this regard even now, but I was even worse back then. Whenever there was snowfall, I would get my friends and secretly head out to search for that flower, trying hard to find it as I hoped to surprise my wife."

"Heeh, how unexpected. You have friends, Wil?"

"—At this point, it might be more accurate to say I had friends. In their eyes, my present self would probably seem to be much more of a fool than the simple fellow I was back then."

He slowly shook his head, his tone somehow seeming unshakeable as he spoke. In response, Ferris shut his mouth, aware that he said something he shouldn't have.

Thus, an awkward silence fell over the courtyard. —And then,

"Raise your head, Wilhelm. Have you forgotten the words you said when you swore loyalty to me?"

Crusch spoke firmly, she would not tolerate this sort of silence from Wilhelm.

Maintaining her dignified stance, Crusch stood right in front of Wilhelm's eyes,

"I am aware that you have sacrificed many things to get here. It cannot be helped that you have some lingering attachment to those things. However, that is not something you must regret."

"…"

"Regret is something that always seeps into you regardless of what choice you make, like stagnant dregs. I am no exception, nor are you, nor is anyone in this world. These dregs cannot be avoided, but they only produce hesitation when you look beyond the results of your choices. Therefore, I shall firmly declare this right now:"

Pausing for a moment, Crusch took some time to select her next words,

"—Today is not a day for crying and mourning."

"…"

Ferris wondered if anyone beside him had noticed the fleeting emotion that filled Crusch's words.

For an instant, Ferris' heart was torn apart by Crusch's strong words, and he felt a sadness so powerful it could rend his soul itself.

The throbbing of the powerful conviction that pushed her spirit to such noble heights—Just who besides Ferris knew that the source was none other than the dregs known as 'regret' that Crusch herself felt.

"Not today, is it. —Aah, seriously, at this age I even have to be taught how pathetic I am."

Suddenly, having reflected on Crusch's words, Wilhelm hung his head deeply. The old swordsman then faced Crusch once more and nodded with a face that suggested he was no longer tormented by his troubles.

“It is just as you said, Lady Crusch. I lack the qualifications to even stand here. And despite that, I am still here. —Therefore, today is not a day for regret.”

“Correct… Although I do feel that it was Ferris and myself who left you hanging.”

“C-Lady Crusch… Ferri was intentionally staying quiet about that too…”

The serious atmosphere that had enveloped the courtyard was dispelled by those few words from Crusch. Sensing this, Ferris dropped his shoulders at his master’s overly honest nature.

And thus, intentionally acting like he normally did, he buried the earlier impact deep in his heart.

Watching their exchange, Wilhelm smiled gently,

“Once I avenge my wife, I could search for the elusive snow flower she dreamed of. I am able to think this way thanks to you and Ferris. —I thank you.”

And so, in that courtyard’s gentle snowfall, the Sword Demon discovered yet another way to offer his wife his love.

3

“A flower that only blooms on snowy days, you think something like that really exists?”

“From a commonsensical perspective, it is difficult to imagine a flower blooming in the snowy seasons. However, in the end it is just that, difficult to imagine. A spirit’s influence or some special terrain… There exist a number of possibilities.”

As she said this, Crusch looked closely at Ferris who had grabbed her arm, and fell silent.

Close enough that they could feel each other’s white breaths, Ferris clung tightly to Crusch’s firm warmth. He knew that this was disrespectful, but he also knew that Crusch’s magnanimity was such that she would forgive it.

Like this, Ferris would occasionally wish to feel Crusch’s existence so strongly it hurt.

This was a coping mechanism to deal with the sense of loneliness the memories of his early childhood brought about, this had completely settled down over these past several years, but—

“…You’re thinking about his highness.”

“…Yes.”

Ferris responded to Crusch’s question with a slightly lower tone of voice and nodded.

Between the two of them, the word highness referred to just one person—The fourth prince of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and a young man who was irreplaceable to them, Fourier Lugunica.

He was a precious person who unfortunately left this world due to the epidemic which ravaged the royal family and ultimately became the impetus for the royal selection. —Well, if it really was the case that everyone in the nation mourned his loss, perhaps Crusch wouldn’t have even participated in the royal selection.

“…”

Wilhelm had left, Crusch and Ferris were now alone in the mansion’s courtyard.

The Karsten family’s secondary residence in the capital—Even here, they had countless memories of Fourier. Cheerful and affable, he loved Crusch and Ferris from the bottom of his heart, memories of such a person.

“But we never did see the snow with his highness. I was under the mistaken impression that no matter what, no matter when, there would be a memory of him accompanying it, but…”

"…"

"There are still any number of things we haven't done with him, and sights we haven't seen with him."

That was the source of the regret Crusch was trying to tell Wilhelm about, this was something only Ferris who had spotted her momentary agony knew.

Crusch's current goal was to bolster the public's sentiment toward the now deceased Fourier.

He had never directly confirmed what exactly she felt towards Fourier. However, Ferris was not heartless enough to ask her such a cruel question.

So he simply wished to share her feelings towards the person her eyes were looking back on.

"If his highness were here, he'd definitely be having the time of his life in the snow, huh. And after playing in the snow with all his heart, he'd be exhausted and come down with a fever the next day."

"It is certainly easy to imagine such a thing happening. It is as if I can hear him imploring you to cure his fever."

"Yeah. Perhaps he would simply dislike the cold, and complain about it. After all, wasn't he always bundled up in fur because he was so sensitive to the cold?"

Fourier would often choose to don an overcoat made from animal pelts. Ferris' impression of him caused Crusch to lower her eyes ever so slightly.

"…Because he was the lion king."

"Eh?"

"No, it's nothing. I was just admiring the fact that you were watching him so closely."

"Well, it was obvious that I would. After all, this is his highness we’re talking about here.”

He really stood out. He was always so boisterous, and he just wouldn’t leave you alone.

Loved by all, he was always the center of attention, and for some reason seeing this made her proud.

—She liked him. She loved him. It wasn’t about the relationship between a man and a woman, she felt that way toward him as a person.

“Speaking of snow, there was that marriage proposal his highness suddenly received from the Holy Kingdom. Judging by how desperate he was back then, perhaps he really was no good at dealing with the cold…”

“Lady Crusch.”

As Crusch reminisced nostalgically, Ferris shook his head. Releasing Crusch’s arm from his grip, Ferris stared at her face to face.

It was his own joke that started it, but he did not want her to misunderstand Fourier’s feelings. He loved Crusch from the bottom of his heart. So,

“The reason he turned down that proposal was not because he disliked the cold. His highness…”

“—I know.”

“Lady Crusch…”

“I know, Ferris. —I know.”

Repeating these words any number of times, Crusch would not allow Ferris to finish that sentence.

And Ferris realized too late that what Crusch was showing him was not rejection, but consideration.

If at this moment, Ferris were to speak Fourier’s feelings in his place, the wound in Crusch's heart would once again bleed.

And they would both have no choice but to admit that the responsibility for that lay with Ferris.

"…"

The two fell silent, and the snow falling from the sky slowly piled up on their hair and shoulders.

The freezing snowflakes caused Ferris' shoulders to tremble slightly. The wind wasn't all that cold, but if they stayed like this they would certainly be chilled to the core.

Perhaps they were no longer in the appropriate state of mind to enjoy the snowy scenery—

"Ferris."

"—a"

As if reading Ferris' thoughts, Crusch called his name and offered him her arm.

In response to this gesture, Ferris hesitated slightly and then timidly took her arm once more.

The distance between them was one they were completely used to, and Crusch gently stroked Ferris' head.

"I wonder how his highness would have taken Wilhelm's tale of that snow flower."

There was no need for them to keep talking about Fourier. But if they decided to avoid the topic of Fourier now, there would be no going back.

Fourier definitely wasn't someone who had only left them with sad memories.

Crusch's attitude was proof of this, and Ferris felt ashamed of his thoughtlessness. He then nuzzled his face against Crusch's shoulder with no hesitation.

"—His highness would definitely go and exaggerate it like crazy, he'd probably say something like how finding the flower means your wish will come true. And then he'd be all excited about going to look for it."

"Aah, I can practically see it."

"But Ferris would stop him by telling him he needs to prepare properly. And then his highness would take it seriously, hear what he needs to hear from a whole lot of people, gather his tools, and then…"

Once they started talking about it, once they started imagining it, they could clearly grasp what Fourier would do, what he would say, and what he would wish for.

—Even now, the fact that he was unable to save Fourier remained in Ferris' heart as regret.

Crusch was the same, so this regret probably would not fade or even lessen.

Fourier's final days could not be called pleasant by any means, they were filled with pain and suffering.

But even so—

"—His highness definitely would have done that sort of thing."

"—Yes, I think so too."

Surrounded by the gentle snowfall, with their smiles undying, Ferris and Crusch spoke of the man who could not be with them now for a long, long time.

The image of the blonde young man bearing a gentle, handsome face manifested in their minds.

—The face they imagined, was forever smiling at them without reservation.

Chapter 3:
Anastasia Camp

1

“Amazin’! This is amazin’! Just look at it, iss’ amazin’! It’s all white!”

Mimi’s excited voice could be heard from out in the garden.

Boisterously dashing out of the porch, the girl opened the iron gate and started running around.

There was the resounding sound of her footsteps as well as a noise that sounded as though she was hopping on the wall and gate.

The animated nature of the girl known as Mimi was nothing unusual at this point, they could imagine what she was up to without even needing to look.

And since Mimi had taken the initiative to rush outside like this—

“S-Sister! It’s dangerous to hop onto places like that! Come on, get down here!”

“Just forget it, brother. There’s no way we can stop her when she’s that excited. More importantly, I believe it would be in our best interest to ensure she does not end up falling.”

“T-Tivey, you’re saying that too…”

Two boys’ voices rushed out, chasing after the noise of her running around. Their exchange couldn’t really be called a discussion since it felt like the conclusion was already decided.

In their voices, one could clearly perceive faintheartedness and resignation just as the contents of their conversation would suggest.

These two voices definitely belonged to Mimi’s two little brothers, Hetaro and Tivey, who were always at the mercy of her innocence.

The two brothers had rushed out into the garden in pursuit of their overly energetic elder sister, wracking their brains looking for a way to stop her.

And then—

“Just what is all this commotion about? What’s got Mimi so excited…?”

Yet another person with an entirely different kind of voice cut in.

That was the voice of a young man, retaining a little of the high pitch from before his voice dropped. The young man had come out here to find out what exactly was causing all of this commotion, and was rendered speechless mid-sentence.

His breath seemed to catch for a moment, after which the young man’s lips parted once more,

“Wh-What is this scenery?! Don’t tell me you lot went and did something… Mugyu!”

“Ohh! Joshua, you suck at dodging! That was a super direct hit!”

His astonished shouting was immediately followed by the sound of him falling onto his behind as he shrieked. He then heard Mimi burst into laughter, and found that Hetaro was at a complete loss, “Aaah”

“Wh-Wh-What…”

“Calm down, Joshua. Sturdy yourself. That just now was our sister’s doing. Unfortunately for you, you’re going to get wrapped up in this.”

“Wrapped up in… Eh, Ehh?! H-Hold on a minute!”

The young man—Joshua desperately called for some restraint in response to this abrupt situation. However, Mimi who prioritized having fun above all else complete ignored him and resumed whatever she was doing with a “Take this!”

Faint sounds rang out consecutively as something rapidly struck the wall and the ground. The three of them desperately ran around trying to escape from this something.

“S-Sister! That’s terrible! That’s so mean!”

“Fuuhahaha! The conditions of a battle are always changing! If you’ve got time to whine, then go ahead and launch a counterattack, Hetaro!”

“Talking is useless, brother. And Joshua, you’re going to be her victim yet again at this rate.”

“Th-This, this isn’t why I came out here… Hii!”

Strained shrieks and joyful laughter overlapped, and the area was turned into a battlefield in an instant. The man who was listening to all of this intently smiled as he heard the nearby garden turn into a fierce battleground.

And then, when he took a look outside the window in the direction the voices were coming from, the reason Mimi and the others were frolicking about so joyously gently descended into his field of view.

“Looks like those kids are having the time of their lives, huh.”

As he looked out the window, the woman who was with him casually addressed him.

The owner of this voice was also the owner of this room in which she was at a large desk, attending to her paperwork. In response to her voice, the man returned his gaze to her and nodded, “Yes.”

“If you find them to be a disturbance, I shall head out and warn Mimi and the rest…”

“Aah, it’s fine, it’s fine. I’ve just finished my work myself. I had completely blocked it out while I was working, so it was a bit of a surprise when I suddenly heard it.”

“Is that so. If so, this might surprise you even further.”

Closing one eye in response to the woman's gentle, elegant smile, the man—Julius Juukulius directed his refined countenance towards the window.

And when he felt her turn in the same direction, he continued,

"—It is snowing, Lady Anastasia."

2

Standing up, she walked over to the window and gazed upon the scenery outside it.

Before her, in the garden of the Hoshin company branch office which was serving as Anastasia's base in the capital, she could see that just as the earlier commotion suggested, Joshua and the three siblings were enjoying themselves as they played in the snow—Although Joshua and the brothers might object to putting it that way. After all, them playing in the snow essentially amounted to just running away from Mimi as she rapidly formed and threw snowballs endlessly.

It was a problem of sentiment for Hetaro, a problem of pessimism for Tivey, and a problem of endurance for Joshua, due to which they were each unable to launch a counterattack against Mimi and were thus forced to remain on the defensive.

Regardless, this game wasn't dangerous enough to warrant a scolding, and Mimi and the rest probably weren't the only ones enjoying themselves in the snowy capital right now.

Even setting aside the fact that this wasn't the right season, it was quite rare for the capital to see snowfall. Surely most of the capital's residents would accept that this was an unusual occurrence.

And the way they accepted it would vary from person to person. This place was no exception—

"—Snow? Why's something so troublesome gotta go and happen…"

In contrast to the tumultuous merriment going on outside, the woman—Anastasia was extremely troubled.

Possessing wavy, light purple hair, adorned with high quality goods even though these were her work clothes, with her beloved white fox scarf wrapped around her neck, she was a woman whose pale blue-green eyes could see through almost anyone.

Her mutter offered a glimpse at her anguish, causing Julius to smile wryly as he perceived this.

“What’s with that face of yours. Perhaps you have something you’d like to say to me, Julius?”

“No, please do not concern yourself. I was simply relieved that the reaction you had when you heard it was snowing was no different from the image of you I had in my mind.”

“I wonder if I can really be happy about what that implies.”

Alluding to the slight change in his expression, Anastasia pouted in displeasure. Regardless, Julius’ words did not really have any hidden implications or anything.

In truth, Julius really was relieved, and he understood too.

That Anastasia Hoshin, the woman Julius Juukulius had recommended for the royal selection which would decide the next ruler, was this kind of person.

One could only naively feel delight at the mention of snow if they were in a position free of responsibility. If one was aware they were in a higher position, they could not simply receive such news with joy. In order to live up to their responsibilities, they would also have to consider what would happen after the fact, and what secondary effects it would have.

“Lady Anastasia, about this snow…”

“Supposing this snowfall continues with no signs of stopping, I guess I’ll have to devise some ways to cope with it. The company’s transportation fees and storage charges are nothing to sneeze at, you know. We do have reserves for winter stored in each location, but perhaps it would be ideal to check out the big cities at least.”

"…"

Linking her hands in front of her chest, Anastasia's expression turned serious as she thought about how she ought to deal with the snow. He couldn't fully read how the abacus of thoughts in her head was moving, but even that part served as more than enough proof that she was qualified to compete for the throne.

"The items in demand will probably change too, the sun's whims sure are troublesome… Julius, there's that expression again. Really, what exactly is the matter?"

Julius was staring intently at Anastasia's face as she agonized over how to best deal with the situation, causing her to frown at him. She felt around her face with her hands and,

"Could it perhaps be that I have some ink splashed on my face? That would be quite embarrassing."

"No, your face bears not a single blemish. Please be at ease."

"The way you put it… Well, if that's the case, what is it that you want to say?"

With a small sigh, Anastasia urged Julius to continue. In response, Julius bowed theatrically and,

"This is somewhat belated, but I shall now offer my report. I had one of my buds, Ia, examine the condition of the sky. According to her, this snow will not last long."

"Can a quasi-spirit really know that sort of thing?"

"It would seem that this time is an exception. It appears that this snowfall is the work of a Great Spirit—Of course, you can rest assured that they did not have malicious intent in doing so, and that this is nothing to worry about."

Saying this, Julius nimbly raised his right arm and announced the contributions of the faint red glow that was perched on it—His contracted quasi-spirit, Ia.

The noble spirit which had accomplished its task somehow seemed to be proud as it brightened its red glow. Seeing this, Anastasia nodded several times, “I see, I see.”

“If you’re saying all of that, then it’s probably no big deal after all, what a relief. But anyway, quasi-spirits sure are convenient, huh. Can they comprehend the sun’s mood at any given time?”

“No, as I just said, this time was an exception. Although, this does not apply if it is a spirit changing the weather.”

“I see. That’s unfortunate. If it were possible to determine the sun’s temperament, that could become a business in its own right…”

As expected of a utilitarian like Anastasia, she wouldn’t give up her pursuit of profit even when it came to the work of a quasi-spirit. Standing next to Julius who was smiling wryly at this attitude of hers, she looked towards the window,

“If it’s not going to be a problem, then perhaps this snow is actually pretty pleasant. Although snow isn’t really something you see in Kararagi…”

“In Lugunica as well, it is rare for the capital to see any snowfall. Of course it would be a different matter in the territories closer to the Holy Kingdom, but it is certainly unusual.”

“And if it were the Vollachian Empire in the south, there probably wouldn’t be any snow in a lifetime.”

The Vollachian Empire Anastasia spoke of had high temperatures throughout the year, and it was known for its exceptionally clear climate barring the rainy season. Most of its populace would probably never see snow in their lives unless they left the empire.

“But even snow can be quite the threat in large enough quantities. Have you ever been to the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, Lady Anastasia?”

“Well, as far as the Albis river goes. Any further would be too harsh for a delicate maiden such as myself, after all.”

Anastasia giggled with a hand against her mouth. However, Julius nodded deeply in response and spoke, “How very discerning of you.”

“Given your current position, perhaps the opportunity might someday come, please do take care when it does. The terrain of Gusteko eats away at those of other lands more than one would imagine.”

“You’re once again speaking in a manner filled with genuine emotion. What, do you have a story like that?”

“…This is a story passed down from when my grandfather was part of the royal knights.”

Giving in to Anastasia’s deeply curious eyes, Julius revealed a story which had been passed down from the era in which his grandfather had been part of the royal knights.

“This is a tale of several decades ago, when the Kingdom of Lugunica was under heavy pressure due to the precarious situation it was in with the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko and the Vollachian Empire. The Kingdom’s royal knights and the Holy Kingdom’s acolyte knights clashed along the countries’ borders, and some of the royal knights including my grandfather were left behind in the snow.”

Gusteko was originally said to be an extremely cold land, a threat to human life with its never ending snowfall and blizzards, and in the face of nature itself the royal knights were forced into a horrendous battle. Julius’ grandfather was among the knights who ended up separating from the main force, ultimately being abandoned in the snow.

“Losing his way, with his body temperature dropping, surrounded by allies who had lost their sanity and fallen into derangement, my grandfather was ready to die. If he really had died back then, I probably never would have been born.”

“That’s quite the scary story. So, how did your grandpa make it back home? In all of that snow, he must have been completely helpless, right?"

"Hah. According to my grandfather, he was saved by some kind of phantom."

"…Phantom?"

Anastasia frowned, her expression suggesting that she didn't quite get it. Julius agreed with this reaction. Because when his grandfather first told him this story, he too had the same reaction.

But his grandfather firmly insisted on the existence of the phantom.

"My grandfather dragged his comrades' bodies as he desperately struggled to escape the labyrinth of snow. Like so, he wandered around in the blizzard… And before he knew it, he was in a forest."

"Forest? You mean a normal one with a bunch of trees and stuff?"

"Yes. However, it was a frozen forest. And it was in that frozen forest that my grandfather met the phantom. When the phantom saw my grandfather and his comrades, it said this."

"…"

The way Julius told this story took Anastasia's breath away as she eagerly awaited the answer.

And then—

"—'If you cause any chaos around my beloved daughter, I will never forgive you.'"

"…Hah?"

"The next instant, my grandfather and his comrades were in an unfamiliar place. But not in a snowstorm, they were in an open plain. After this, my grandfather safely linked up with the royal knights and attempted to report the details of what happened, but he was not taken seriously."

Ever since, this story known as 'The Phantom Father in The Snow' was passed down among the knights in scrupulous detail. It was said that it was all a delusion brought about by the extreme cold and frightfully ferocious snow.

"…Umm, what was that story about again?"

"It was a cautionary tale from my grandfather to teach us of how dreadful snow can be. If it was at all useful to you, I think my grandfather can rest in peace."

"You sure are sincere, huh."

It seemed the conclusion was not to her liking, Julius reflected on his insufficient storytelling prowess in response to her forced smile. However, this story from his grandfather who hated snow had a continuation—

"In truth, I wondered if this phantom that saved my grandfather might have been a spirit. Due to the effects of my divine protection of spirit attraction, I have always felt the presence of spirits nearby from a young age, but… Perhaps that was the reason I was interested in the spirit arts."

"What's with that, it suddenly turned around and became a nice story."

He didn't know whether or not it was a good story, but that he was here now was definitely thanks to that phantom. By saving his grandfather, and becoming one of the reasons he chose his current path.

Supposing that phantom really was a spirit, he would like to meet it someday.

"Well, anyhow. One way or another, your story about snow was pretty interesting. Although I can't really use it as reference for when I head to the snowy regions."

"That… Let us devote ourselves to that when we next get the chance."

"I'll be waiting, I suppose. You went to the trouble of telling me that story, but with the amount of snow we've got right now, it looks like Joshua's going to be the only victim."

Outside the window, Mimi's laughter could be heard even now, causing Anastasia to shrug her shoulders.

Julius' younger brother Joshua was most likely desperately resisting Mimi's snowy attacks even now.

They could no longer hear the screams that had been present until just now, so it seemed he was really concentrating now.

"Maybe he got done in and ended up getting buried in the snow."

"It is me saying this, but Joshua too is a member of the Juukulius family, Lady Anastasia. It is true that he was not blessed with combat ability or stamina, but he has received the same training."

Furthermore, Joshua too had heard their grandfather's tale of his hardships in the snow. Perhaps Joshua had his own feelings towards snow, and measures against it.

But in response to Julius' assertion, Anastasia closed one eye.

"It's good that you love your little brother, but it's a different matter when it makes you misread the situation, isn't that right? To put it in terms of suitability, this is a match to which Mimi is suited and Joshua is not."

"That is… Just as you say."

Even Julius had no rebuttal to what Anastasia had earnestly pointed out.

Certainly, no matter how he looked at it his statement just now was far too biased. In truth, Mimi's ability was at a level even Julius wasn't used to. Unfortunately for Joshua, he was most likely completely outmatched.

"Ah, are you perhaps feeling down? You don't really need to feel that way, though? I don't think the way you want to have faith in others is a bad thing."

“Hah… Want to have faith, is it?”

“Although you could perhaps use just a little bit of self reflection considering that apparent lack of self-awareness.”

Julius’ yellow eyes showed bewilderment in response to these unexpected words.

Wanting to have faith, that was the first time anyone had said anything of the sort about him. As Julius sincerely thought about how he should take this, Anastasia tilted her head, “Don’t ya think?”

“The way you have faith in Joshua is part of it too, at your core, you’re fundamentally a person who believes in others’ potential, isn’t that right? That’s also the reason you became my knight, I’m sure?”

“That… Applies to everyone, does it not?”

“It’s probably true that everyone has a part of them that’s like that. But that’s usually tangled up with a number of ulterior motives. But you, Julius, you don’t have any of that. That’s why, it’s dangerous.”

With her skills refined through innumerable negotiations, there was no one who could see through others’ ulterior motives and true natures as well as Anastasia could.

The reason Julius wished to help her reach the throne was not simply because the insignia recognized her as a dragon maiden, it was because of this nature of his.

Her eyes had deemed that that was the sort of person Julius was on the inside. That he couldn’t earnestly accept this was no different from rendering his own judgement useless.

“Perhaps it really is as you say, Lady Anastasia. To have this danger pointed out by my master, it is a disgrace worth reflecting on as a knight who is supposed to protect those around himself.”

“You really are sincere.”

"But allow me to make one correction. It was not because I was expecting anything from you that I became your knight. Of course, I do hope to see you managing the country's affairs."

"I know, I know."

With a gentle expression, Anastasia urged Julius to continue as he worried about putting it in a way that would be misunderstood. Supported by his master's magnanimity, Julius straightened his posture and continued.

Julius' yellow eyes pierced her pale bluish green ones.

"—The reason I became your knight was because you chose me. From this perspective, could it not be said that you were the one who had faith in me?"

"Haah, I see, I see. Simply put, don't call me someone who wants to put their faith in others, is that what you want to say, my knight?"

"Meaning we are both equal in this regard, that is correct."

"Mm, you actually went and said it."

Anastasia spoke in a teasing tone, and then looked surprised at Julius' answer. She then touched the scarf around her neck, and stroked its fur as she sighed.

"Right, right, I get it. I lose, I lose. We both put our faith in others, and we each have the other's faith put in us, huh. That's kind of complicated."

In response to her words, Julius started to reflect on what he had done, wondering if he had inconvenienced her. But when he saw her expression, he put a stop to this.

Anastasia's smile would not let him do something so inelegant.

"—What's this now! Looks like you guys are having a great time! How about I join in as well, you lil' brats!"

"Kyaa! It's the captain! Amazin', captain! That's an amazin' snowball—!”

“Cap! Captain! That’s kinda dangero… Sister! Here! Over here!”

“Joshua, let’s run away while we still can… Joshua? Joshua!”

“J-Just leave me behind… I don’t want, to become… A burden…”

The tiny space that had formed between master and servant was completely overwritten by the chaotic noise outside.

It seemed Ricardo had barged into Mimi’s snow game. If the huge dogman joined and started throwing snow without holding back, the situation would probably turn all the more chaotic.

“Hah, I can already picture it. Honestly, he never settles down no matter how old he gets…”

“However, I believe that is one of Ricardo’s strengths.”

“Well, I do think he makes a great pet?”

Somehow, this praise for Ricardo caused Anastasia to pridefully puff her chest a little. Finding this reaction of hers charming, Julius once again directed his attention towards the commotion outside.

He heard the loud laughter of the comrades who would fight side by side to the bitter end in the royal selection. This produced a very pleasant sensation in Julius’ heart,

“Perhaps it is a bit late to ask this, but what do you think of snow, Lady Anastasia?”

“Didn’t I tell you right from the start? Depending on the situation, it can block roads and thereby cause the transportation fees to pile up, ruin our storage charges, and change what’s popular, it’s a real pain.”

Anastasia outlined a number of points concerning snow from a merchant’s perspective. However, after she mentioned all of these grievances about snow, she continued, “But,” “If I’m just looking at it, it’s actually rather beautiful, snow.”

“Yes, I think so too.”

Anastasia reluctantly muttered this under her breath, and Julius agreed with her. The knight then slowly turned towards his master, and offered her his hand.

Anastasia stared at this hand.

“Lady Anastasia, would you not like to take a short break?”

“—Fufu, to make your master slack off, what a bad knight you are. You’ll make that ‘Finest’ title of yours cry, you know?”

“If it is for the sake of this moment, I do not regret that.”

Julius answered Anastasia’s teasing provocation with a bold smile.

In response to this answer, Anastasia nodded with satisfaction,

“—Alright then. Just a little.”

And saying this, she took the hand her knight offered her and stood up.

Chapter 4:
Priscilla Camp

1

—He was unable to take his eyes off the profile of the woman who was gazing out of her window.

"…"

Her crimson eyes housed a little surprise, and he noticed that her pink lips emitted some kind of sound.

The woman then stood up in an exceedingly refined manner, and approached the window her beautiful face was directed at.

She freely wore a dress that boldly exposed her chest and back. Forget extraordinary beauty, one would need beauty two or three levels beyond ordinary to properly wear such a dress. The woman effortlessly flaunted this dress, easily transcending these conditions available to only a special few by five levels as she reached out with her fair, slender hand and opened the room's window.

The moment she did, a refreshing breeze blew into the room and scattered the bundle of papers on her desk, causing them to dance around the room.

Surrounded by this scenery of dancing bits of paper, the woman continued to gaze outside without the slightest movement,

"…"

Her lips moved once more and produced yet another sound of some sort.

It was probably the same sound as last time. The man whose attention was completely focused on her profile couldn't quite make out what this sound was—

"Obelisk!"

“—You foolish commoner. Just how many times do you intend to make me repeat myself.”

The next instant, the direct impact to the middle of his forehead caused him to scream as he toppled over backwards. The crimson woman looked down on him with her arms crossed, emphasizing her voluptuous chest—

It was the folding fan that she threw as she turned around that collided with his forehead. The speed and power with which she threw it were no joke, the impact’s penetrating power was such that it might have split the average person’s skull.

Honestly, if it were anyone else taking such a blow, they would almost certainly lose some brain cells.

“Owowow… Just what are you doing all of a sudden, princess. If I weren’t the sort of masked character who always had a helmet on, that would have been a bloodbath just now.”

“Fool. Even I consider my opponents. As if I’d aim for the head if it were anyone besides yourself. If it were Schult in your place, perhaps I would blow on his ear to bring him back to his senses.”

“Oioioi, that’s totally favoritism, isn’t it. Surely even I ought to get a nice, sexy reward now and then. Why am I the only one treated so horribly…”

“It is because you are my jester that I have let you off with this much. If you were some common miscreant, I would have taken your head off. —Or are you perhaps dissatisfied with your current position?”

“Hehh, what are you saying, princess. You can throw that fan at me whenever you want.”

Shaking his head which had received her attack, he gave her a thumbs up and immediately changed his tune. The crimson woman gave a hmph in response to the man’s rapidly changing attitude.

Seeing this, the man who deemed silence to be unfavorable raised his hand, “By the way,” "Back to what we were talking about, why did you suddenly whack my head? The room's got paper scattered all over too, it's all too sudden, isn't it?"

"What, so you really were just staring blankly. Nothing about this is sudden or anything. I called to you twice. You were the one who ignored this entirely."

"…Aah, so back then, that was you calling to me, huh."

Puzzled by this rather embarrassing situation, he tried to lighten the atmosphere with some fake laughter. Contrary to their color, her crimson eyes were cold like a blade. His strategy failed.

"Although I can't shake the feeling that even attempting to calm things down was a mistake to begin with considering this appearance of mine."

"What are you muttering, are you even listening to me, Al?"

"Absolutely, I'm listening, princess."

Picking up the folding fan that was lying by his feet, the man—Al approached the woman and handed it to her.

The part of Al's head which had been whacked by the folding fan was covered by a black helmet. It was thanks to this defense that his head wasn't split in two. He was thankful to the one who had given him this helmet, truly thankful.

Setting that aside—

"Well, I'm sorry about ignoring you and all, but what exactly is the matter?"

"What a hopelessly dull man you are. I personally walked to the window and opened it by my own hand… Do try to imagine for what reason I would have done such a thing."

"…Ventilation, or did you perhaps feel like looking at the sky?"

Neither of these seemed very much like her. But compared to the former, the latter seemed far more likely.

And in truth, the girl nodded in response to his suggestion, “Correct,”

“I came to gaze upon the sky. —You have a look as well, Al.”

The woman indicated the outside of the window with a movement of her jaw, and Al obediently followed her instruction. Standing by her side, he quietly took a look outside. The view from his helmet was unexpectedly decent. Straining his eyes, he directed his attention up towards the faintly clouded sky—

“—Heeh, what a surprise.”

“Is it not.”

As Al admired the sight, Priscilla who was right next to him nodded as though he had taken the words right out of her mouth.

Immediately after, yet another breeze blew into the room, similar to when she first opened the window. The wind once again wreaked havoc in the room, causing her disarrayed stack of papers to dance through the air once more.

However, there was something else dancing along with these pieces of paper, white, fleeting crystals of water—

“—Out of season snow, this must be someone’s doing, is that not correct?”

With that powdery snow reflected in her crimson eyes, the woman —Priscilla Barielle murmured joyfully.

To Al, this voice somehow sounded like she was in high spirits.

2

“But even so, isn’t it really rare for it to snow around this area of the kingdom?”

“That is correct! I believe that this hardly ever happens. At the very least, this is my first time seeing snow!"

"First time, it's at that level, huh. You must be feeling pretty excited then, Schult.

Saying this, Al looked at the pink-haired boy with a gaze as though he was looking at something charming.

The boy's name was Schult, a chamberlain in training working in Priscilla's mansion—Or rather, Priscilla's page who was something like a cherished pet to her.

The person in question didn't really care, but the reason Priscilla originally picked him up when she found him on the verge of starvation was because their eyes happened to be the same color.

Priscilla had stated that if this weren't the case, she most likely would have just ignored him. Even Al understood that she wasn't trying to hide her embarrassment or anything by saying this, her words simply described the reality of the situation.

Amazingly, despite the various hardships he had experienced until now, Schult did not take any strange turns in life and was growing up to be a nice and wholesome boy, it was adorable. Even Al could see that.

"—? Sir Al, is something the matter? Have I said something strange?"

As Al thought this, his gaze caused Schult who was picking up the scattered papers to tilt his head. Al shrugged his sole arm's shoulder at the boy who was presently engaged in his usual chores that weren't even worth discussing.

"No, I was just thinking that it's adorable how you're so wholesome. You probably feel the same way, don't you princess?"

"Do not speak such absurdities, Al. Even supposing he were an infant, it is only natural that he would give his all for my sake. Therefore, Schult's efforts have no bearing on my evaluation of him. The reason I keep him by my side is only because his appearance and bearing are splendid, nothing more."

"That was an incredibly roundabout way of putting it, but basically, you just like the way he looks?"

Priscilla who had given this haughty answer hmphed at Al's simplified explanation. But considering she made no attempt to correct his explanation, it was probably fine to think that it was for the most part accurate.

Despite her attitude, she left the task of cleaning the room to Schult as she sat on the windowsill, idly watching the dancing snow.

"…"

Suddenly, Al realized that he had forgotten to even breathe as he gazed at her profile, captivated.

There was the unusual snowy scenery as well, but to begin with Priscilla's own beauty was already at a transcendent level on its own. There existed beauty in this world which no paintbrush could reproduce, it would be no exaggeration to say that Priscilla was among such beauty, that was simply a fact.

"Well, that's basically what my argument amounts to, so please forgive me."

"I haven't even said anything and you're already making excuses for stealing glances at my profile, you truly are an insipid man. Regardless, do not misunderstand me. I am not so narrow-minded as to lose my temper over such a thing."

"Eh, talk about unexpected. Wouldn't you be like, your gaze is bothersome, zubaaa or something?"

"It is inevitable that men would experience carnal desires at the sight of my beauty, such is this world. If I were to find fault in this, I would have to behead every man in the world. That in itself would be the height of wastefulness."

"Mm, that's some confidence you've got. But from someone at your level, I guess those aren't words to make light of."

Smiling wryly at her display that was both pompous and magnanimous, Al fiddled with the metal at his helmet's joint. With this metallic sound behind her, Priscilla continued to gaze at the outside.

It was also difficult to understand just where exactly her interest was directed, that was the sort of woman she was. It was true that they were experiencing some unusual weather, but Al didn't think that it was the sort of thing you could enjoy looking at for extended periods of time.

"You seem rather passionate about this, princess. Do you have some sort of emotional attachment to snow?"

"It is nothing of the sort. Rather, the issue at hand comes before that… Much like Schult, I too am seeing snow for the first time."

"Eh? Seriously?"

Her unexpected statement caused Al's eyes to widen within his helmet. Next to Al, Schult too looked up at Priscilla with an expression of surprise on his cute face.

"This is your first time seeing snow as well, Lady Priscilla! How surprising! But I am also delighted that we are experiencing this together!"

"You do say some cute things, Schult. I shall pat your head."

"Please go ahead."

As Schult smiled innocently, Priscilla beckoned him over to her and started stroking his pink, fluffy hair. Al sighed deeply as he watched her hand move.

Perhaps annoyed by this reaction, Priscilla's crimson eyes narrowed,

"What is it, would you perhaps like to say something?"

"It's not like I particularly want to say it or anything. I was just thinking about how unpredictable you are. How should I put it, it's kinda weird to say it like this, but you seemed to be the kind of character who knew everything and could do anything, you know?"

“—Hm. Certainly, there can be no doubt that I am a being not far from such a description.”

“I said it myself, but this is my first time seeing someone who would actually accept the descriptors omniscient and omnipotent.”

Anyway, it was a fact that that was the sort of impression Al had of this woman who was so full of confidence.

It probably was a bit too much to say she knew everything and could do anything after all, but even so, he thought that perhaps Priscilla who had both extensive knowledge and excellent analytical ability had seen all there was to see in this world.

That was exactly why he thought that he of all people would be able to catch her interest.

“So it’s quite the surprise to hear that something like snow is a fresh experience for you. Unexpectedly, it would appear that you’ve never had certain common experiences, princess.”

“While I am certainly curious as to what basis you are using to define the word common, you evidently haven’t put much thought into your statement. Rather, the impression you have of me has unexpectedly roused my interest.”

With her hand still on Schult’s head, Priscilla smiled sweetly at Al’s words. Al’s shoulders trembled slightly, as if someone was running their finger down his spine.

Seeing this out of the corner of her eye, Priscilla once again directed her gaze towards the sky,

“I have seen it any number of times in books, but I had never in my life encountered snow. The sight of white snow descending from the skies was ultimately something I could only imagine.”

Snow descended onto the palm she held out. This snow as ephemeral as grains of sand immediately melted in her palm, becoming ordinary drops of water.

Priscilla hmphed having confirmed this,

"It was not quite as wondrous as I had hoped."

"Hoping for something wondrous, you just said something pretty damned cute."

"Fool. Do you not think it disrespectful to describe me as cute. There exist much more fitting words to extol my beauty. Schult, let us hear them."

"Eh? Y-Yes! Umm, umm… Lady Priscilla is really 'elegant' and a 'beauty'!"

"You're quite a fast learner. You used those words well."

Schult turned red in the face as he displayed the knowledge he had only just learned, impressing Al. Priscilla too nodded with satisfaction in response to his efforts.

"Behold, this is the manner in which my servants ought to serve me. Al, you too must exhibit the proper diligence."

"Alright, understood, I'll keep that in mind."

Saluting with his right hand, Al nodded at Priscilla's words, not taking them too seriously. His attitude was probably completely transparent to Priscilla, but she did not say anything about it.

"Fundamentally speaking, they are no different from raindrops it would seem. Dried up water solidifies atop the clouds, and then it is merely a matter of whether it descends as raindrops or snowflakes. Should it become snowflakes, they cling to one another and descend as snow. And they hence melt and repeat this process."

"Heeh, you could have fooled me. Was that written in your books as well?"

"When I see something in person, I comprehend it to its core. This does not extend as far as the minute details, but it is for the most part true."

Seeming bored as she said this, Priscilla pulled her folding fan out of her cleavage. Concealing her mouth by unfolding it, she turned away from the sky and towards Al.

“I told you just moments before. That there can be no doubt that I am a being approaching omniscience and omnipotence.”

“Oh-Ohh, you’re digging that up again, huh. No, I do think that you possess such traits to some extent, but…”

“If so, for what reason did you hold such an impression of mineself? There are of course the beauty and elegance with which I was born as well as my countless other virtues, but among them which was it that stood out most?”

“That’s…”

“Slow. I shall tell you. —It was my intelligence.”

Al faltered, and Priscilla firmly declared this without waiting for his answer.

She was so overwhelming that he could actually feel some heat, causing him to fall silent and bite his lip. Priscilla shouldn’t have been able to see him do this within his helmet, however, she donned a faint, sadistic smile,

“Intelligence, that is the ability to reason which is all that separates mankind from beasts… There are those who say such things, but I do not agree in the slightest. Even beasts in the wild possess consciousness, they possess the instinct to learn, and they possess a life with which to make use of their knowledge.”

“…”

“Intelligence, it can be said that it is a guide which transcends fetters such as sentiment and bonds, and which determines whether one lives or dies. That being the case, beasts too possess intelligence. There exists no qualitative difference between man and beast, to unconditionally deem them beneath humans goes beyond pride, it is simply laughable.”

“Wooow, that’s an absurd argument in itself.”

“Do not try to gloss over this by acting like a clown, Al. I am asking you a question regarding your principles.”

Al tried to shrug in response to her smile, but he suddenly stopped.

From directly before him, Priscilla’s crimson eyes were fixed on his eyes within his helmet.

“Answer carefully. If it is not the presence of intelligence which separates man from beast, where exactly lies the difference between them? What is it that definitively separates them?

Her gaze made Al feel like his neck was burning. Al’s breath halted, and realized all too late.

—That right now, he had been placed at a crossroads far more extreme than he had imagined.

“…”

Priscilla stopped talking and continued to pierce him with her unchanging gaze.

Having stated her theory, she was now waiting for a rebuttal, her attitude as she did so was as composed as ever, but hidden as its edges were a ferocity and vigor that would occasionally flare up.

They weren’t grand, easily understood emotions. However, they were certainly passionate.

This invisible storm of emotion was thrust into Al’s throat in the form of pressure, questioning what he would do next. If he did not choose his words properly, this pressure would quite literally pierce his throat.

The snowfall and their chit chat relating to it, that was all it took to land him in this situation.

He knew from the very beginning how risky it was to stay by her side, and all of that risk was now gushing forth.

“Where lies the difference between man and beast? What is it that separates me from the likes of you?”

The same words, with a small change midway.

Those words declared that Priscilla and Al were entirely different organisms, and seemed to be a sort of ritual to determine the difference that ought to exist between them, causing him to gulp.

He then moved his heavy tongue, and while swallowing his bitter saliva,

“The difference is, the opportunity to refine oneself.”

“…”

“Even beasts learn the connection between life and death. However, the difference between those who live in the wild where failure means death and we who live in more forgiving environments is the presence of opportunities, and whether or not one can act on them. Even though you were born as a sexy cutie, the reason you seemed to be omniscient and omnipotent…”

“—Good. I shall allow it.”

As Al chose his next words, the sharp sound of her fan shutting suddenly interrupted him.

With this sound came a few words from Priscilla, and in an instant, the pressure bearing down on his entire body dissipated. Immediately realizing that he had forgotten to even breathe, Al let the tension leave his shoulders.

Priscilla’s throat hummed with stifled laughter in response to Al’s grandiose reaction,

“Well, how about it. When pushed into a corner, your intelligence serves its purpose does it not? Predicting the future based on your past experience and your relationship with me, it desperately struggles to avoid the worst case scenario. But then, that is an ability beasts also possess. It does not serve as a difference between man and beast.”

“Your jokes are too harsh, princess… You’d be angry if I said that, huh?”

“Of course.”

Priscilla firmly asserted that she certainly was not joking. This caused Al to heave a truly deep sigh after which he started wiping off his damp back which was covered in cold sweat.

“Unlike beasts, humans have the opportunity to actively expand their knowledge. Humans have methods with which to do so. Simply put, read a book. I was not joking or anything of the sort when I told you to be more diligent.”

“So, you’re basically saying that the omnipotent aura you give off is because you read a lot of books.”

“Not even mineself was perfect at birth. There was quite a bit which I learned from ink and paper. In much the same way that one requires flame and a hammer to forge steel, one also requires writing to refine one’s spirit. If one were to lack either, they would only end up as a failure of a human being.”

“…”

“It is not as though I particularly wish to be surrounded exclusively by that which is beautiful. However, I am not so eccentric as to keep by my side those who would by their own negligence reduce themselves to ugliness.”

“…In other words, you’re telling me that you’re tired of my usual act, so you want me to keep refining new ones?”

“…”

The way Al splendidly simplified it momentarily caused Priscilla’s breath to halt. She then let out a small sigh,

“Haha, hahahaha! Well now, to think you would rephrase my words in such a hackneyed fashion. An act of all things! An act, you say! …Kuku, I see you are unwilling to concede your role as a jester.”

“Aaah, I’m glad I could make you laugh. However, princess, I’ve got a few things I’d like to say too. Although your words were so magnificent I kinda ended up getting convinced myself.”

As Priscilla laughed loudly, Al wracked his brain as he continued.

Carefully, but in a manner that wasn’t completely submissive, while remaining aware of who was at his core—

“I’m not your knight or anything, princess. I’ve sworn allegiance to you as your servant, but there’s no point in expecting anything more from me. That would be too heavy a load for the old man going back beyond the Grand Cascade.”

“Oh? Simply put, you do not intend to do as I say, is that it?”

“I do realize that I’d probably have my head taken off if I said that. That’s why I came up with my own compromise back in that chat about acting.”

Declaring this, Al walked towards Priscilla with determination. Standing close enough to be touched by the crimson woman sitting on the windowsill as she looked at him, he threw out his chest.

“In the end, I’m satisfied being your jester. So I’ll keep amusing you in all sorts of ways so you never get bored, princess.”

“…”

“In exchange, I won’t give up on the things I can’t give up on. That is the compromise between my role as a jester and that stuff about steel bookworms you like so much.”

There was no helping it if she didn’t like this, Al presented his opinion directly.

He didn’t know if Priscilla would fly into a rage or perhaps calmly release her killing intent, but even if that happened, there was no helping it. —In that case, he just needed to bring her into the territory.

However, it soon turned out that his fears were completely needless.

“Very well. —If you are aware of your role as my jester, and possess a clear ‘vision’ of the future, I shall not object. It is only natural to leave gardening to the gardener.”

“…Are you sure?”

“How tedious… Surely you do not wish for me to take your head off by my own hand?”

“Nonono, as if as if as if, no way no way no way.”

Wildly waving his arm, head, and legs, Al pleaded before Priscilla’s suspicious eyes with no objection. What effects this would end up having was a different matter, but for now, it seemed as though Al’s attitude had earned him another day of life.

And in this manner, the conversation between Al and Priscilla reached its conclusion,

“…Buhaaa! I-I-I-I’m past my limit! That was so scary!”

“Woahwoahwoah, Schult?”

With his face completely red, Schult heaved an exaggerated sigh as though he was glad it was finally over. Schult who had endeavored not to interrupt their conversation with a hand over his mouth raised his voice, “Excuse me!”

“The two of you have reconciled, correct? It’s okay now, correct?”

“Ohh, sorry to make you worry. Papa and mama are getting along just fine… Damuhin!”

“Fool, just who are you calling papa and mama.”

The instant he cracked this joke, Al ducked to dodge the sweeping fan strike that was sailing overhead. Al felt as though the top of his helmet had been singed, and Priscilla ignored his fear as she gently raised Schult’s jaw with said fan.

“I forced an unpleasant experience on you, but you endured it wonderfully. I shall personally reward you. What would you like?”

“U-Umm, uhh, can I ask for anything?”

“I shall allow it. Ask for all that you desire.”

“…Then, since it’s snowing and all, I’d like to go outside with you, Lady Priscilla.”

Schult’s face lit up as he announced this in response to Priscilla’s magnanimous words. In response to this, Al who was sitting on the floor nervously looked at Priscilla.

Having seen snow for the first time, Priscilla had expressed a great deal of disappointment. To ask her to walk out there with her servant was—

“Very well. This shall be my first time playing in the snow as well. It could be said that my ‘tension’ is rising.”

“Eh, seriously?! Then why were you in such a bad mood just now?!”

“I was merely explaining one of my principles. Come, let us go, Al. As my jester, you shall amuse me to the fullest even within the snow.”

Priscilla nimbly descended from the windowsill as she said this and turned around with a wave of the hem of her dress. Next to her, Schult stared at Al while smiling brightly.

“Sir Al, it must be fun! Have you ever played in the snow, Sir Al?”

“Playing in the snow, huh.”

Tilting his head in response to Schult’s question, Al took a look outside the window, at the scenery of the faintly accumulating snow. The sight of the area covered in a blanket of snow stimulated old, distant memories—

“Come to think of it, I don’t remember ever playing in the snow either. I’m kind of looking forward to it.”

“That is wonderful! For the three of us to experience this for the first time, it is miraculous!”

“A rather trivial miracle. But I suppose it is only fitting for something so stale as snow.”

As Schult showed his excitement, Priscilla stroked his head and then boldly set forth. Schult hurriedly followed after her, and Al tagged along while fiddling with his helmet.

Midway, Al stopped for a moment. He then looked out of the window, at the snow descending from the sky,

“—I don’t remember ever playing in the snow or anything, after all.”

Muttering this in a voice audible to no one, he continued to follow after the master and servant pair ahead of him.

Chapter 5:
Felt Camp

1

“…”

The instant she advanced, Felt directed her gaze to the left as she pitched her body to the right.

Throwing her opponent off balance with her misleading gaze, Felt dived in the opposite direction. Felt wouldn’t need to use these sorts of tricks against just anyone, but from what she’d experienced thus far, she absolutely needed such tricks against highly skilled fellows.

And this especially applied to the opponent before her, she would not hesitate in the slightest to throw everything she had at him.

“…”

Felt’s little trick caused the young man whose eyes seemed to contain the skies themselves to purse his lips. Seeing this out of the corner of her eye, a smile of satisfaction manifested at the edges of Felt’s mouth as she advanced.

She would make it, she had done it, she had won, she had broken through, such phrases assuring her of her victory continually flashed through her mind.

Trampling the red carpet, she immediately dashed forward to make this assurance a reality—

“—Lady Felt.”

“Dawaaa—?!”

The man she thought she had outwitted and left behind suddenly appeared before her, causing her to scream.

The next instant, with her eyes still widened, a light impact to her legs swept her off her feet and sent her small body flying upwards with unexpected speed and force. This impact that seemed to cause heaven and earth to turn over made Felt imagine the sight of herself slamming into the floor. But no matter how long she waited, the collision she expected never came.

This was only natural. The reason being—

“Are you alright? I hope you have not bitten your tongue or anything of the sort.”

The red-haired young man whose blue eyes were staring at her from up close. There was hardly any distance at all between their faces. They were so close they could feel each other’s breaths.

This too was only natural, for Felt was at present in the young man’s arms. To put it in simpler terms, he was carrying her.

Realizing what kind of situation she was in, Felt’s mood immediately worsened. Narrowing her eyes in dissatisfaction and biting her lip with displeasure, she growled angrily which caused the young man to lower his brow and smile bitterly.

“Your present attitude would suggest that your tongue is quite alright.”

“Hmph! Thank you so much for worrying about me. Thanks to the sense of defeat you so elegantly carved into me, I haven’t sustained the slightest injury. Damn it! What a cheap trick, acting like I managed to take you by surprise.”

Ignoring the fact that she was using cheap tricks herself, Felt crossed her arms and turned her face away from him. The young man maintained his bitter smile in response to this unfriendly attitude of hers,

“No, I do apologize if I have caused you to misunderstand. Your distraction this time was magnificent. However, moving in the opposite direction of one’s gaze is a rather standard tactic in itself, due to which…”

“Don’t just advise me so leisurely! Let me tell you, this is a serious match between you and me! You’re gonna regret it if you take me too lightly, Reinhard!”

Saying this, Felt thrust her finger into the man—Reinhard Van Astrea’s face which was right before her as she boldly displayed what a sore loser she was.

This little contest between Felt and Reinhard had been going on for about a month now.

—Ever since that incident at the loot house in the slums, Felt had been living a life of confinement, robbed of her free will ever since Reinhard captured her.

However, it was not so constrained a life as these words would suggest, she was not cuffed and could freely change her clothes, she could eat as she pleased and take her baths whenever, speaking in practical terms her environment was rather hospitable. Even Felt thought that if she no longer had any attachments to the outside, perhaps it wouldn’t be so bad to just indulge in this life to the fullest.

But she did have such attachments. Reasons she had to be outside and not here.

“That’s why I’m going to sneak past you and bid farewell to this mansion. Once I do that, you can no longer chase after me. Surely you haven’t forgotten.”

“Of course not. Therefore, I too shall endeavor to keep a watchful eye on you.”

Reinhard’s response to Felt’s caustic words was no exaggeration, his declaration was entirely sincere.

In truth, Felt had already tried to escape Reinhard’s mansion countless times over this past month, and he had foiled her attempts every single time. To attempt to count how many times this had occurred would be a fool’s errand.

It wasn’t as if she was always aiming for a direct confrontation with Reinhard. She would in fact use any means necessary to avoid him such as aiming for when he was going out, or going to bed.

“But despite that you somehow always show up right when I try to escape… You damned monster.”

“Even I find such a manner of speaking hurtful. In addition, please allow me to explain one other thing. It would seem that you believe that I used an underhanded trick just now, but that is a misunderstanding.”

“Aah?”

“My surprise was genuine. But what caused that surprise was not your actions, Lady Felt…”

Pausing there, Reinhard turned around, to the hallway’s window that was behind him. Felt who was in his arms also naturally ended up facing it and thus ended up having to confirm what had entered her line of sight.

Thus, in Reinhard’s arms, the sight Felt found before her was—

“—It was the snow.”

The scene of powdery white snow gently dancing down onto the capital.

2

“It is not as if the capital never sees snowfall, but this is a rather unusual sight, is it not.”

Felt’s eyes were fixed on the sky, and Reinhard who was gazing upon the same sky said this to her in a deeply moved voice. His voice contained no small amount of admiration which caused Felt’s lips to warp.

“What’s with that. Looks like the peerless Great Sword Saint is getting pretty excited over a bit of snow.”

“I am not so joyful as all that. If the snow were to accumulate to an excessive extent, the capital’s functions would be affected as well.

There is also the concern that this is very clearly not a natural phenomenon, however…”

“However?”

“I do not sense the presence of any malice in this sky. That being the case, I was thinking that at least for now, it would not be so bad to simply think of it as a beautiful snowscape.”

With an expression that looked like a bashful smile, Reinhard explained what he was feeling. Staring at this expression of his, Felt felt as though she was seeing something unusual.

In order to improve her chances of victory in their contest, Felt had spent a lot of time observing him over this past month, a fact she took pride in. Of course, since this was his home, she could on a rather frequent basis see him in a more relaxed state, in both mind and body, than he would be outside, however,

“Wipe that dopey look off your face, damn it.”

Thus, Felt pushed on his cheek with her palm in a rather irritated mood. She then sighed at Reinhard who offered no resistance.

“To begin with, what’s so great about snow anyway. It’s just a pain, ain’t it.”

“Do you not like snow, Lady Felt?”

“It ain’t at the level of like or dislike. You think people like me who live in the slum’s back alleys could possibly be happy about snow?”

Felt hmphed as if disparaging his rather elegant question.

Obviously, life in the slums was lacking in all sorts of ways. In that sort of environment where you weren’t even sure if you would have a roof or walls to sleep in, something like snowfall was simply hell.

“There was even a time when I ate a whole bunch of snow ‘cause I had nothing else to eat, and ended up getting diarrhea because of it.”

“Was that not due to your own lack of discrimination…”

“Oh shut up already, old man Rom got mad at me too, you know! Quit complaining already! Also, just how long are you planning to hold me, put me down already!”

Flailing around wildly, Felt showed her displeasure in an attempt to get away from Reinhard’s chest. Giving in to her stubborn attitude, Reinhard released her onto the floor.

Patting her knees, Felt clicked her tongue loud enough to be sure Reinhard would hear it.

“I’ll acknowledge that I lost today. Even if I tried to escape now, I doubt the outcome would be very pleasant considering how cold it is out there.”

“Understood. I agree that it would be best to leave it at that. After all, it would be unfortunate if you were to fall sick, and also… No, never mind.”

“—?”

The way he spoke suggested he had something more to say, but Reinhard did not say anything further. She somehow did not feel like interrogating him about it, and so their conversation came to a close.

It would also be irritating if on top of being the loser, she had to spend her time looking at the winner’s face.

Therefore, Felt once again narrowed her eyes at the sight of the snow dancing down outside the window,

“—I hope old man Rom isn’t feeling too cold.”

3

“And so, I once again failed to escape. I’m seriously losing confidence in my legs here…”

“Oh dear, you must not say such things. You must first of all believe in yourself. Or you will not be able to draw forth your power when it is necessary.”

“Even though you’re saying that sort of thing, you’re still one of the people interfering with my escape, granny…”

In this manner, Felt complained with her jaw on the dining room’s table in response to which the old woman laughed pleasantly.

She was a woman who had aged well and gave off an elegant impression. The reason she looked so dignified despite her plain clothing was most likely because of the sharp beauty her figure possessed as she stood up straight, her back’s posture immaculate.

This woman was yet another obstacle to her attempts to escape from Reinhard’s devilish clutches—She was one half of the old married couple who would impede Felt’s attempts to escape whenever Reinhard wasn’t around. Even though Reinhard called her grandma or whatever, she was clearly no ordinary person considering her movements did not show her age in the slightest.

Regardless, except for when she interfered with her escapes, she was always kind to Felt and the food she made was also exceptionally delicious due to which Felt could not dislike her, and thus their strange acquaintanceship continued.

It was to the extent that on days on which Felt sincerely admitted defeat, they would get together to have tea and snacks like this.

“However, it would be troublesome if the snow were to fall too heavily. I am getting on in years myself so I would end up worrying you and the young master if I were to fall and get hurt.”

“Don’t just decide on your own that I’d be worried… I would be worried, though!”

“Fufu, I am well aware. Because you are a kind child, Lady Felt.”

Saying this, she gently stroked a sullen Felt’s head without reservation. It felt somewhat ticklish, but it also felt rather pleasant, so Felt would not shake her off of anything.

"It would seem that you are not especially fond of snow, Lady Felt."

"…Did you hear that from Reinhard? It's not like I particularly like or dislike the weather, you know? It's more like asking whether it's easy to live in or hard to live in, isn't that right?"

"You might be correct. Certainly, clearing up all of this snow is going to be hard for grandpa, that is troublesome indeed."

"Snow is unexpectedly heavy when it piles up too, gramps'll have to be careful about his back."

"Oh dear, I'll have you know that he is still plenty strong despite his age. In both body and soul."

With a hand against her mouth, the old lady giggled. Her voice and expression clearly displayed her overflowing love for her husband.

The image of the old man giving it his all shoveling the snow around the mansion naturally manifested in Felt's mind.

He could not speak, but he was hale and hearty despite his age. As one would expect, this old man was also one of the people impeding her escape, but just like the old lady Felt could not dislike him.

His aura was of the same sort as Rom's, he was kind and gentle and just seemed like a good person.

—Felt wasn't very good at dealing with good people. Or more accurately, she felt that good people were taken advantage of by those around them and she couldn't bear that sort of environment.

The awareness that she herself was depending on Rom would take this even further.

"Tch."

"Come now, you must not click your tongue. It makes you appear to be one of poor character."

"I had a poor upbringing. So it shouldn't be a problem to overlook something like clicking…”

“Your upbringing has no bearing on the matter. It is a matter of consideration for the other party. Or do you not mind if the old lady you are speaking to is hurt? Aah, how sad, oh dear, oh dear…”

“Oh, come on! That was my bad! I get it! I won’t do it in front of you anymore!”

Felt panicked as the old lady lowered her head and placed her hands against her eyes.

It was not that she actually thought that she would cry over something like this, but it was often the case that such words of lament came from the heart. Felt knew a lot about the elderly. Old man Rom himself did this sort of thing on a regular basis.

“Man, I’m just no match for you, granny. Have you been toying with people that way for a long time or what.”

“Well, that is not the case. I was terribly hard headed when I was young… To the extent that I myself was put off by it. If it weren’t for grandpa, perhaps I never would have married.”

“Heeh, how unexpected. Have you and gramps been working here long?”

“Do you perhaps mean the Astrea family when you say ‘here’? If so, I have been serving the Astrea family from the day I was born. Because that is the lineage I was born into.”

“Hmm, that seems pretty rough too. Then you probably knew Reinhard back when he was a brat, huh?”

With a sour expression, Felt carefully considered the old lady’s feelings from the bottom of her heart. Felt’s words caused the old lady to raise her eyebrows slightly, after which her expression suddenly changed into a relaxed smile.

“Do you dislike the young master, Lady Felt?”

“I certainly do, what about it?”

"Oh my, fufu."

She was wondering what she was going to say, this instant response from an exasperated Felt made her giggle.

Felt had never seen this sort of reaction from her before.

"What's so funny, to make you laugh like that."

"No, no, I was just surprised. Because it is very rare for the young master to be disliked by anyone."

"Is that so? Although I get the feeling that if you asked around the slums and back alleys, you'd find any number of people who hate the guy?"

In truth, in the slums which had very many people of self-debasing character, merely being born into the commoners' district would make one an object of envy. To come from a family of knights, and moreover bear such a celebrated title as 'Sword Saint' meant that there would be no end to those who bore jealousy or envy towards him.

"None of them could say it to his face. That is why I am certain I can place my trust in you… Just like I trusted that man with Lady Theresia."

"—?"

She couldn't quite hear what the old lady had whispered towards the end. But when Felt tilted her head, the old lady shook her head, still smiling,

"Oh dear. When I speak with you, I somehow seem to end up thinking back to my past."

"Your past, how many decades ago was that?"

"Ah, how cruel… About forty years ago, perhaps?"

"That's more than double my age…"

It wasn't as much as old man Rom, but she could definitely feel this lady's age. Unfortunately for Felt, she was a long ways off from broaching the same territory as them. Of course, they must have in their own way had their immature periods just like Felt.

"I was that way too, you know. I was once but a young maiden in love."

"—? You're still a maiden in love, aren't you. When you're getting along that well with ol' gramps, are you not aware of it?"

"…Well now."

The sight of the old lady's bashful smile with her cheeks slightly flushed made Felt smile as well.

She would occasionally spot the two of them while they were alone, what an intimate couple they were. Felt didn't have much experience when it came to this sort of thing, but she thought that that was what a loving couple ought to be like.

Having this pointed out, the old lady nodded any number of times as if reflecting on her joy. Her eyes then narrowed and gently stared at Felt.

"Granny?"

"Lady Felt, did you know that there exists a special flower that only blooms on snowy days?"

Felt thought that this was an extremely sudden change in topic, but she did not point this out and instead offered a straightforward response, "Yeah?"

A flower that only blooms on snowy days, meaning its composition was rather troublesome.

"Flowers only bloom when they have water and sunlight, don't they? For one to only bloom on snowy days, why does it grow in such a troublesome manner?"

"Why is that, I wonder. It is a flower so elusive that there is doubt as to whether or not it even really exists. All that is known about it is that it is a flower as white as snow itself."

"…It kinda feels like you're talking about something really memorable, doesn't it?"

She couldn't imagine that the old lady's explanation came from some passing memory. The old lady nodded when Felt pointed this out, "Yes."

"After all, I went looking for it several decades ago. With the then head of the Astrea family and his wife… My former master and grandpa came along too."

"Hmm, sounds like quite the large scale expedition. So, did you manage to find the flower?"

While smiling faintly, the old lady lowered her brow as she shook her head. Felt accepted this answer as if it was only natural. Had she seen in person, she would not describe it as an elusive flower or whatever.

A white flower that would only display its full glory in the snow, one that might not even really exist.

"There was even a legend going around that if you found it, your wish would come true."

"A wish, huh."

"Supposing you were to find it, Lady Felt, what do you suppose you would wish for?"

"I guess I'd have that damned Reinhard punished properly and then run away from the mansion with you. And then you'd make me snacks every day."

"Oh dear, I could not go on living if I were to be separated from grandpa."

"Then I'll bring him along too. Reinhard can probably manage this huge place on his own, anyway."

Someone like Reinhard could probably somehow manage something even if he were left on his own. Perhaps he would even find it easier to live this way.

Considering how he always had to be worried about his surroundings, taking care not to break anything.

“What about you, granny? If you found that flower right now, what would you wish for?”

“My wish, is it…?”

“It’s not like I’m the only one who has the right to make wishes, right?”

On the contrary, Felt couldn’t bring herself to like the idea of entrusting her wishes to such a supernatural force. If merely wishing actually did anything, there wouldn’t be such a thing as slums in this world.

Wishes would not save anyone. Even if that hope kept them alive.

“If my wish could be fulfilled…”

“If it could be fulfilled?”

“… I wanted to try living together with two close friends of mine, that perhaps.”

“…”

“That we would somehow deal with things together. If I could entrust a wish to the past, I would surely wish for something like this…Oh dear. It seems I really am getting old.”

The old lady giggled as she made this joke.

However, to Felt, that fleeting smile of hers somehow seemed to reflect her true feelings.

“Lady Felt. Just who I was looking for.”

“Geh.”

Felt welcomed Reinhard who was approaching her with a grimace. In response to her unpleasant expression, Reinhard maintained his ever present smile,

“I have just returned from clearing the snow out front with grandpa. I do not believe that the ground will freeze over, but do take care not to slip when you leap out of the window.”

“Hey, don’t talk as if it’s a given that I’ll be leaping out the window.”

That was an escape method that had already failed several tens of times. Perhaps she would wait and see and try it again when they least expect it, but now was not the time.

“Well then, it’s actually pretty good timing for me as well now that I’ve run into you. The granny’s laid out some warm drinks in the dining room, so bring grandpa with you.”

“Aah, that is a great help. As expected, even my fingers go numb when I clear out the snow.”

“Eh? Is that so? That’s kinda human, huh.”

As she said this, Felt grabbed Reinhard’s hand and confirmed this shocking fact by holding his cold, red fingers. Perhaps one could say it was obvious, but he was a human with blood flowing through him.

“So, how was the snow? It’d probably be a pain later if there’s a whole lot piling up.”

“—You need not worry. Even if it were to pile up to some extent, I believe it will all melt tomorrow.”

“I see, I see. Doesn’t look like there’s anything to worry about then.”

Dropping Reinhard’s hand, Felt ran past him.

If Reinhard and the old man were heading to the dining room, Felt would return to her room for now. There, she would have to refine her escape plans for tomorrow and onwards—

"—Lady Felt."

"Aah? What."

Felt turned around in response to this call. Gazing into her red eyes, Reinhard hesitated ever so slightly,

"—No, it is nothing. Please stay warm in your room."

"Right. You can go ahead and catch a cold, though. That'd help me out quite a bit."

Waving her hand apathetically, Felt turned away from Reinhard and returned to her room.

She felt Reinhard's gaze behind to the very end, just what was it that he wanted to tell her. Felt wasn't going to and ask about it, she had no obligation to show that much consideration for his feelings.

But since he worked hard clearing out the snow, she would at least forget about escaping for today.

"—What's this."

As she thought this, Felt tilted her head when she spotted a certain something in front of the room allotted to her.

Left out in the hallway, in front of her room, was a single white flower in a small vase. She had never seen it before, but she could tell at a glance who had given it to her.

"That guy, I was wondering what he wanted to say, so this was it."

Her lips curved as she wondered if this was some form of harassment, but she immediately discarded that thought. Reinhard probably had no intention of harassing her. He probably just found a pretty flower and wanted to share that feeling with her.

Felt sighed at his behavior following his return from clearing out the snow as she picked up the vase.

“But even so, that’s a crazy coincidence, huh. I was just talking to granny about this and here it is, a white flower.”

This flower he went and found somewhere bloomed fleetingly yet beautifully, its petals possessed the power to make even Felt who had no interest in flowers think that it was beautiful.

As expected, she couldn’t bear to throw away such a lovely flower just because Reinhard was the one who gave it to her. She decided that she would place it on her windowsill and leave it at that.

“Maybe it really is that snow flower granny was talking about. If that really is the case…”

Entering her room and placing the vase on the windowsill, Felt made a wish to the white petals.

If this really was the snow flower that could grant wishes—

“—Make it so that granny can see nice dreams with her friends.”

Felt said this with a smile as she touched the flower’s white petals.

—To continue a bit further, the snow that covered the capital on this day melted away and disappeared completely the afternoon of the next day.

Even the white flower in Felt’s room soon withered away, perhaps she had handled it poorly.

However, the morning after the snowfall, granny was unusually cheerful as she welcomed Felt, and her breakfast that day was even grander than usual.

She did not ask why she was in such a good mood. Because Felt had already completely forgotten about the wish she had made to the flower yesterday. —She merely gazed upon granny’s joy, and gramps who was delighted when he saw this.

Carried by this good mood she once again challenged Reinhard, and once again experienced crushing defeat.

Even the snowfall had not produced any particular change in Felt's life of confinement—This was merely one page, a moment of the constrained, flurried life she lived until the royal selection finally began.

END

Notes

Chapter 11: The Harmonious Post-Meal Get-Together

1. The drill-nose design originated in the 1963 Toho film Atragon (featuring the submarine Gotengo), was later reused in the 1977 film The War in Space (with the spaceship Gohten), and then passed into anime mecha tradition through Getter-2 in Getter Robo, before gaining widespread popularity and iconic status in Tengen Toppa Gurren Lagann. ↩
2. Sun Wukong wore a magical golden headband (also known as the Tightening Fillet or Constrictive Circlet) that painfully constricted around his skull whenever his master, Tang Sanzang (Tripitaka), recited the Tight-Fillet Spell (a secret sutra or mantra), which the monk used to discipline and tame the Monkey King whenever he acted mischievously, violently, or went out of control. ↩
3. The phrase 炸裂するＮＤＫ（ねえ・どんな・気持ち）ダンス (Exploding NDK (Nee□Donna□Kimochi) Dance) is a playful, exaggerated Japanese internet meme expression referring to the explosive deployment of NDK—an abbreviation for 「ねえねえ、今どんな気持ち？」 (“Nee nee, ima donna kimochi?” meaning “Hey, how are you feeling, now?”). It often describes taunting someone (especially when they’re in an embarrassing, painful, or frustrating situation) by repeatedly asking how they feel, as a form of provocation or further rubbing it in. The “dance” part humorously implies an over-the-top, gleeful performance of this teasing, like someone energetically “dancing” while bombarding the target with the question. NDK itself originated from an ASCII art (AA) used on Japanese forums/2ch for trolling or provocation, featuring a bear-like character (often with “ｸﾏｰ” bear sounds) paired with the line “今どんな気持ち？” to mock or goad others—turning a once-neutral phrase (from a boxing-related interview context that got twisted) into pure online bait. ↩

Chapter 24: The Morning He Yearned For

1. A reference from the movie “Detective Conan: The Time

Bombed Skyscraper”. It references a scene in which the protagonist Shinichi Kudo reassures Ran Mouri, who is forced to disarm a time bomb and fears she will die, that he will stay and face death with her. ↩

Chapter 25: The Voice of Deep Resentment Doesn’t Vanish

1. A sickle weasel (鎌鼬, kamaitachi) is a Japanese yokai, said to ride on gusts of wind, cutting people with their sharp, sickle-like claws. Rumored in Japanese alps, they’re associated with the phenomenon of sudden gales leaving cuts on one’s skin. “For more information, see here”). ↩

Kararagi Girl Meets Cats

1. Ryokucha = A type of tea in Kararagi. Literally green tea. ↩
2. Dekoyaki = A type of food in Kararagi. Probably something like takoyaki. ↩

Sunlight on the Water

1. Most readers might already know this but おねショタ (oneshota) is “older girl x young boy”. ↩
2. Hollow = ghost in the Re:Zero universe. ↩
3. ミイラ取りがミイラになる “a mummy hunter becoming a mummy”.
   It’s a phrase for when someone who went to look for someone else became unable to come back. It could also mean that someone who went to convince someone else became convinced by the other person instead. ↩
4. What Priscilla actually says here is テンションが上がる. It would be “my tension is increasing” if it was literally translated, but that will mean something different. ↩
5. What Al actually says here is ラッキースケベ (lucky sukebe). It’s a type of fanservice in anime/manga where a character accidentally witnesses another character being naked, or where a character accidentally touches another character’s you know what. ↩

Prologue: Aldebaran

1. The base sentence for this line is exactly the same as Al’s catchphrase of “Your stars were bad”, however, the Kanji 星 is accompanied with 菜月・昴 as furigana, which is Natsuki

Subaru's full name (in Kanji). Because of this, the sentence may be read as "The stars known as Natsuki Subaru were bad" or even "Natsuki Subaru messed up" if you stretch it a teeny bit further. In the text, we have rendered the sentence as "Natsuki Subaru failed you" since it is the closest thing to what the Witch is actually audibly saying, just keep in mind that it is meant to overlap with the meaning of "Your stars were bad". ↩

Chapter 52: Aldebaran I

1. Kannon is the Japanese name of the Avalokiteśvara, a figure in Buddhism associated with great compassion, who in some depictions possesses a thousand arms. ↩
2. The Witch refers to the term "Make-believe" reminding her of an unpleasant individual. The best guess that can be made here is that of Pandora or the Saintess, as the Japanese term 虚構 used here as make-believe, is fairly close to 虚飾, the term used for the Sin of Vanagloria. ↩

Chapter 54: Warlock VS Witch

1. 鬼に金棒めいた is a Japanese idiom along the lines of "Giving a metal bat to an Oni". Essentially saying to make a strong thing even stronger. I have used all of my brainpower to generate an English equivalent to capture this sentiment. As some of you might know, this text is Japanese, and Japanese I can handle just fine. But Japanese with cultural specific idioms is like a chimp with a machine gun! ↩

Chapter 6: Instantaneous Water Heater

1. It being darkest at the foot of the lighthouse is a Japanese idiom that means sometimes you can't see what is right under your nose. ↩
2. An instantaneous water heater (also known as a tankless water heater) directly heats water rather than storing hot water in a tank. They are much more common in Japan and elsewhere in the world than in North America, so we figured a translation note would be useful for those readers where they are uncommon. ↩

Chapter 7: My Friend

1. We have chosen to use the same translation for the term 聖女 here that we also used when it showed up in Arc 9 for the

Saintess and the Valiant. We considered going with the more generic Saint, but given that we have very little context at this point for the term in either instance and how they may or may not be connected, and due to the fact that 聖女 is an exclusively feminine term (lit. holy woman), we discarded the idea. ↩

Chapter 7: My Friend

1. A yandere is a character trope where a character is obsessively in love with another, to the point of mental illness, which may result in violence. ↩

Chapter 8: The Consequences of a Choice

1. “To send salt to the enemy” is an idiom in Japanese meaning to help an enemy rather than exploiting their weakness. It originates from a story from the Sengoku Jidai, the Warring States period of Japan. Two of the most famous and influential warlords of the period, Uesugi Kenshin and Takeda Shingen, were famous for their rivalry with each other. However, when the Hōjō, another clan that Shingen had broken ties with, cut off salt shipments to the Kai province under him, Kenshin decried it as cowardly and sent salt from the province under his command, Echigo, saying he would settle the war between them properly. ↩

Chapter 10: Faith Embedded

1. Otto is emphasizing the politeness markers (です and ～ます) in his speech here, which we have rendered here as him emphasizing words that might otherwise be contracted as “y’know” or “that’s”. ↩
2. What is translated in this sentence as “seeing a new perspective” is in fact an idiom that can be translated literally as “fish scales falling from their eyes”. This idiom originates from the Book of Acts in the New Testament (specifically Acts 9:18), from the story of the conversion of Saul (later the Apostle Paul) to Christianity on the road to Damascus, where after seeing a vision of Jesus that would lead him to convert, he was blinded. Later, his sight was restored and it is said something like the scales of a fish fell away from his eyes as he was healed. Since Christian imagery and themes are common throughout Re:Zero, we figured giving some extra context would not hurt. ↩

Second Period

1. Downtown no Gaki no Tsukai ya Arahende reference, one of the hosts Masatoshi Hamada will open many of the skits with this exact phrasing. ↩
2. Not sure if this should be translated otherwise, but a license of total transmission is a term for a kind of initiation given in certain disciplines like judo or tea ceremony where the teacher gives the student permission to begin teaching others. ↩
3. Subaru in his dialogue said Andaa maindo in katakana and in japanese is saying 下心 which means an ulterior motive, usually of a sexual or romantic kind and is literally composed of 下 down/under and 心 heart/mind. ↩